Stockholm, stok'holm (L. Holmia), the capital of Sweden, situated at the E. extremity of Lake Mälar, where it discharges into an arm of the Baltic Sea, 330 miles NE. of Copenhagen. Lat. of observatory, 59° 20′ 34″ N.; lon. 18° 3′ 30″ E. Few cities have a more picturesque situation than Stockholm, built as it is on rocky and elevated islands and peninsulas cut from the main-land by fjords, with primeval forests extending almost within the city limits and stretches of bare granitic rock protruding between the houses. It has often been styled the "Venice of the North." The oldest part of Stockholm, known as the Stader, lies on an island at the extremity of Lake Mälar, and is connected by bridges with the rest of the city and with the island of Riddarholm. The old sections are compactly built, with narrow streets sloping steeply to the water, but the newer portions are attractively laid out with broad avenues, open squares, and numerous sculptural monuments. There are some beautiful parks. The most striking architectural feature of the place is the imposing royal palace, in Italian Renaissance style. Of the numerous ecclesiastical structures the principal are the Storkyrka; the Riddarholm's Kyrka, with a lofty perforated iron spire, the burial-place of the Swedish kings; the Katarina Kyrka; and the Tyska Kyrka, in German Renaissance style. Among the notable secular edifices are the Riddarhus ("knight's house"), with an interesting collection of portraits and armorial bearings of Swedish nobles; the stately buildings of the Northern Museum; the National Museum, in Renaissance style, containing fine art-galleries and a collection of Swedish antiquities; and the new opera-house. Among the monuments are an obelisk erected to the memory of Gustavus III. and statues of Gustavus Adolphus and Charles XII. The royal library of Stockholm contains over 300,000 volumes, about 10,000 manuscripts, and one of the largest collections of pamphlets in the world. Among institutions of learning are an institute of higher studies (established in 1878), a medico-chirurgical institute, a polytechnic school, an agronomic academy, a school of forestry, and a veterinary school. Stockholm is the seat of the Swedish Academy (organized on the model of the French Academy), the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences, and other learned bodies. The royal collection of weapons is one of the richest in Europe. Stockholm is, next to Gothenburg, the most important industrial centre of Sweden. It has iron-foundries, machine-shops, and breweries and manufactures of furniture, sugar, soap, and tobacco. Ship-building and cotton-spinning are carried on. The city ranks first among Swedish ports in the value of imports. Pop. in 1780, 75,000; in 1850, 93,000; in 1890, 246,454; in 1900, 300,624; in 1903, 311,043.

Strassburg (anc. Argentoratum; Fr. Strasbourg), a city of Germany, capital of Alsace-Lorraine and of Lower Alsace, 2 miles W. of the Rhine, on the river Ill, which here divides into five arms, 72 miles N. by E. of Basel, 80 miles ESE. of Metz, and 28 miles from the French frontier. Lat. of observatory, 48° 35′ 0″ N.; lon. 7° 46′ 10″ E. It is one of the strongest fortresses of the German Empire, having a circle of fourteen forts and inner ramparts. There are great works for flooding the approaches to the city. The strong citadel built by Vauban has been demolished. The extension of the lines of circumvallation has made room for the building up of new quarters which present a great contrast to the older portions, which still retain their mediæval appearance, with narrow streets and many quaint timbered houses. Foremost among the architectural features of the city is the cathedral (or minster), one of the noblest ecclesiastical edifices in Germany, the oldest portion of which dates from the beginning of the eleventh century, and which was completed in the main in 1439. It presents every style of mediæval architecture from Romanesque to Late-Gothic, displaying remarkable symmetry and beauty. It has a splendid W. façade with beautiful sculptures, a rose window 45 feet in diameter, an imposing tower (465 ft. high), and a famous astronomical clock, a wonderful piece of mechanism. Among other edifices of interest are the church of St. Thomas, containing a magnificent marble monument to Marshal Saxe; the former episcopal palace, now containing the municipal museum of art; the richly decorated modern imperial palace, in Florentine Renaissance style; the hall of the Landtag; the Hôtel du Commerce; the so-called Aubette, which has been restored and now houses the conservatory of music; the magnificent new buildings of the university, and the Grosse Metzig, containing a market and the municipal museum of industrial art. Among the many sculptural monuments of the city are statues of Kléber and Gutenberg. The university of Strassburg, which held high rank in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and which remained German under French rule, was refounded as the Emperor William University in 1872, and has risen to great eminence under the fostering care of the imperial government. Its library has over 800,000 volumes. The number of students in 1904 was nearly 1400. Among other educational institutions of the city are a municipal library of over 115,000 volumes.

A canal connects the Ill with the Rhine, where there is a port; and canals afford communication with the water-ways of France. Strassburg is an important commercial centre in the trade between Germany, France, and Switzerland. The industrial establishments of Strassburg comprise manufactories of cigars and tobacco, organs, articles of apparel, machinery, etc., printing establishments, tanneries, foundries, distilleries, and breweries. The pâtés de foie gras of Strassburg are celebrated. In the northeastern outskirts of the city lie the beautiful pleasure-grounds known as the Orangerie. Pop. in 1871, 85,654; in 1901, 151,041, more than half of whom were Catholics.

Strassburg rose to importance in the Middle Ages. In the thirteenth century it emancipated itself from the yoke of its bishops. At the time of the Reformation it was one of the most flourishing of the free imperial cities of the German Empire. In 1681 Louis XIV. annexed it to France. In the war of 1870–71 the city, whose garrison was commanded by Uhrich, held out heroically against the Germans for six weeks, finally surrendering on Sept. 27, 1870. The bishopric of Strassburg dates from Merovingian times. The prince-bishops, who ruled over a considerable district, held a prominent position among the ecclesiastical princes of the old German Empire in the region of the Rhine.

Stuttgart, stŏŏt'gaʀt, a city of Germany, capital of the kingdom of Württemberg, near the left bank of the Neckar, 90 miles WNW. of Munich and 38 miles ESE. of Karlsruhe. It is situated in the midst of a charming region, encompassed by wooded and vine-clad heights. Stuttgart is architecturally one of the most striking cities of Germany, owing to the prevalence of modern edifices in the Renaissance style. The spacious Schlossplatz is the most prominent square. It is enclosed by the imposing Königsbau and Königin-Olga-Bau (both modern structures), the court theatre, the old palace, erected in the sixteenth century, and the new palace (Residenz-Schloss), built in 1746–1807. The square is embellished with attractive pleasure-grounds and contains a jubilee column in honor of King William I. Near by is the Schiller statue, by Thorwaldsen. The Marktplatz is the centre of the old town, which still contains a few residences of the well-to-do burghers of the sixteenth century. The Neckarstrasse, one of the principal thoroughfares, widens out into the Neckarthor, an open space, adorned by Dannecker's water-nymph. W. of the street is the beautiful Schlossgarten, 200 acres in extent, laid out at the beginning of the nineteenth century in the English style. The Königstrasse leads from the Schlossplatz to the new SW. part of the city; the Johannesstrasse, lined with modern edifices, is another handsome street. Many of the public places are embellished with monuments, among which may be mentioned the equestrian statue of Emperor William I. and the colossal bust of the poet Uhland.

The Stiftskirche, dating from the twelfth century, but rebuilt in the fifteenth, and the Hospitalkirche, erected in 1471–93 and restored in 1841, are the principal ancient churches. Among modern ecclesiastical edifices, the gothic church of St. John, the Romanesque Friedenskirche, and the Roman Catholic Marienkirche and Nicolauskirche claim attention. There is also a fine synagogue in the Moorish style. The principal secular buildings, in addition to those already mentioned, are the industrial museum, new townhall, hall of the choral society (the largest structure of the kind in Germany), art museum, royal library (with 500,000 volumes and a collection of antiquities), Realgymnasium, chemical laboratory, palace of justice, palace of the crown-prince, and polytechnic institute (with nearly 1000 students). The building of the former Karlsakademie possesses an historical interest as the school where Schiller studied medicine. Among other institutions are the conservatory of music, academy of fine arts, cabinet of natural history, and veterinary college. The picturesque environs—the Hasenberg, Schillerhöhe, Eugensplatte, Uhlandshöhe, etc.—afford charming views of the town and the valley of the Neckar. Stuttgart is an important industrial centre. Among its manufactures are chemicals, textiles, pianos, furniture, chocolate, paper, etc. The book-publishing business is one of the most important in Germany. Pop. in 1880, 117,303; in 1890, 139,817; in 1900, 181,463, mostly Protestants.

Styria, stĭr'e-ą (Ger. Steiermark, or Steyermark, stī'ẹr-maʀk‘), a duchy and crown-land of Cisleithania, Austria-Hungary, bounded on the N. by Upper and Lower Austria, on the E. by Hungary and Croatia, on the S. by Carniola and Carinthia, and on the W. by Carinthia, Salzburg, and Upper Austria. Area, 8670 sq. m. Styria is almost entirely covered by the ranges of the Eastern Alps. The main Alpine chain traverses the NW. part, entering from Salzburg and extending northeastward between the valleys of the Enns and Mur. Its principal chain here bears the name of Niedere Tauern. It attains an elevation of 9400 feet. In the extreme NW., on the borders of Upper Austria and Salzburg, the Kalkalpen ("Limestone Alps") rise in the Dachstein to an elevation of 9800 feet. In the NE. part of the province is the Semmering, one of the most picturesque mountain-regions in the monarchy. The mountains of Styria are interspersed with beautiful valleys. The province contains nearly the entire valley of the Mur, the principal affluent of the Drave. Its course is at first NE. and then SE. The Drave traverses the SE. part of the province and the Save forms for some distance the boundary on the side of Carniola. The Enns traverses the NW. corner. There are a number of small lakes. Styria possesses many mineral springs, among them being those of Gleichenberg, Rohitsch, and Römerbad. In spite of its mountainous character, Styria is a very productive region, yielding bountiful crops of all kinds of grain (including maize). The hay crop is very large, and potatoes are extensively cultivated. Excellent wine is made in large quantities, and the orchards are prolific. Among other products are flax and hops. Large numbers of live-stock are reared, and the dairying industry is extensively carried on. Nearly one-half of the area of the province is covered with forests, which abound in game, including the chamois. Styria is rich in iron and coal, and the iron- and steel-industry is on an extensive scale. Salt is obtained in large quantities. The population in 1900 was 1,356,494. Somewhat more than two-thirds of the inhabitants are Germans, the remainder being nearly all Slovens. Nearly the entire population is Roman Catholic. The capital is Gratz, which is the seat of a university.

Under the Romans Styria was included in the provinces of Noricum and Pannonia. In the sixth century the Slovens, a Slavic people, poured into the region. Styria was included in the great empire of the Franks. As a frontier territory of the German Empire the region constituted for a time what was known as the Carinthian Mark. One of its feudal princes in the eleventh century assumed the title of Margrave of Steier (the name of his castle), whence the name of Steiermark (Latin, Styria). Towards the close of the twelfth century the feudal state, which had been erected into a duchy, passed to the dukes of Austria of the house of Babenberg. In 1276 Styria became part of the dominions of the Hapsburgs.

Sudan, more correctly Beled-es-Sudan, bĕ-lĕd' ĕs soo'dän', the "land of the blacks"; called also Nigritia, ne-grish'e-ą, a vast region of central Africa, the limits of which are not strictly defined as regards either geographical or political conditions, but which in a general way may be said to comprise the greater portion of the continent lying between the Atlantic Ocean on the W. and the valley of the upper Nile on the E., and between the Sahara on the N. and lat. 5° N. on the south. In this extensive region, which is traversed by the Niger in its western part and by the Bahr-el-Ghazal in the E., and contains Lake Chad near its centre, a vast diversity of physiographic features is presented, from lofty mountains, like those of Adamawa (rising to nearly 10,000 feet), to flat and sterile plains, with steppe-like characters, and elevated plateaus. There is considerable forest-land, but only occasionally is the forest of that luxuriant type of growth which distinguishes many other parts of the heart of the continent. The climate is hot, and fevers, especially in the eastern swampy section, are not uncommon. The banana, yam, durrha, maize, African rice, indigo, and peppers are largely cultivated. The fauna is of the distinctively African type, represented by such of the larger quadrupedal forms as the macaques, lion, leopard, elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, hyena, jackal, various antelopes, buffalo, etc. Almost all of the Sudanese people are blacks (true negroes, with heathen beliefs, and negroes of the Mohammedan faith). Many native sultanates or semi-independent kingdoms (as Bornu, Sokoto, Kanem, Baghirmi, Adamawa, Wadai, etc.) are part of this region. In its present political relations the major part of the Sudan is comprised in the Egyptian or Anglo-Egyptian Sudan (see SUDAN, EGYPTAIN), Nigeria and the other countries bordering on the N. side of the Gulf of Guinea, and in the French Territories of Senegambia and the Niger (constituted in 1902), the last constituting the greater part of what was until 1899 the French Sudan.

Sudan, Egyptian (or Anglo-Egyptian), the eastern division of the Sudan, around the upper Nile, lying between lat. 5° and 22° N., and extending from about lon. 21° 45′ E. to the borders of Abyssinia and Eritrea and the Red Sea. Area, about 950,000 sq. m. The region, which comprises in whole or in greater part old Nubia, Darfur, Sennar, Kordofan, the land of the Bahr-el-Ghazal waters, etc., is in part swampy and malarial, but elsewhere it is well adapted to the cultivation of durrha, millet, pulse, and sesame, and contains extensive forests of ebony, gum-acacia, bamboo, and rubber along the rivers. The dominion of Egypt was extended into this part of the continent by Mehemet Ali in 1820–22. In 1882 the revolt of the Mahdi deprived that country of the control. In 1898 the Anglo-Egyptian army reconquered the country in a campaign culminating in the victory over the Khalifa, the successor of the Mahdi, at Omdurman, near Khartum. The territory S. of lat. 22° N. is now under joint British and Egyptian control, the two flags flying together; it is divided into 12 provinces. The governor-general is appointed by Egypt, Great Britain assenting. Laws are made by proclamation. Goods imported from Egypt enter free of duty. Capital, Khartum. Other important towns and stations are Suakin (on the Red Sea), Omdurman, El-Obeid, Kassala, Berber, Ed-Damer, Wadi-Halfa, and Fashoda. Direct railway communication exists between Khartum and Cairo. Pop. estimated at 2,000,000.

Sudan, French, a former territory in the western part of Africa, comprising the region of the upper Senegal, the region of the upper and middle Niger, and the states inland from the French possessions of Senegal and Guinea. Since 1899 the region has ceased to exist as an independent colony and most of it falls within the tract now officially designated Territories of Senegambia and the Niger.

Suez, soo-ĕz', a frontier seaport town of Egypt, at the head of the Gulf of Suez (an arm of the Red Sea), 76 miles E. of Cairo, with which it is connected by rail. It lies 2 miles N. of Port Ibrahim, the harbor at the entrance to the Suez Canal. Lat. 29° 58′ 6″ N.; lon. 32° 34′ 2″ E. The town, despite some improvement due to the construction of the Suez Canal, and with an increase of population to 17,457 (in 1897), remains dreary and unattractive, although clean and enjoying a good climate. The old town is built of sun-dried bricks and has several mosques. In the new, or European, quarter, there are a number of substantial edifices, warehouses, and modern hotels. On an eminence in the N. is a kiosque of the khedive. The country around is a desert. The water-supply of the town comes from the Nile, through the "freshwater" or Ismailia Canal, originating near Cairo.

Suez, Gulf of, the W. arm of the Red Sea after its bifurcation in lat. 28° N., whence it extends NW. to lat. 30° N. Length, 190 miles; average breadth, 30 miles. It is now connected with the Mediterranean Sea by means of the Suez Canal.

Suez, Isthmus of, the neck of land connecting Asia and Africa, having S. the Gulf of Suez and N. the Mediterranean. Width, in its narrowest part, 72 miles. The surface consists mostly of moving sands, interspersed with some rocky elevations, salt marshes, and ancient lakes. Across this isthmus was cut, in 1859–69, the Suez Canal, 100 miles long, through which large ships pass from the Mediterranean, at Port Said, to the Red Sea (Gulf of Suez) at Port Ibrahim, a short distance S. of Suez. The execution of this vast work was accomplished by a company organized by Ferdinand de Lesseps. Since the opening of the water-way its dimensions have been greatly increased so as to keep pace with the increasing size of vessels. The Canal follows for some distance the borders of Lake Menzaleh, and subsequently traverses the Bullah lakes, Lake Timsah, and the Bitter lakes. The most important station on the route is Ismailia, which occupies a nearly central position. The average time of passage for a continuous day and night journey is about 18½ hours. Port Ibrahim, with its capacious double basin (for men-of-war and merchant craft respectively), has a large dry-dock, and is protected by a massive breakwater. In 1903, 3761 vessels, with a gross tonnage of 16,615,000, passed through the Suez Canal. Of these 2278 were British, 494 German, 261 French, 223 Dutch, 123 Austro-Hungarian, and 119 Russian.

Sulu (Sp. Joló, ho-lō') Islands, an archipelago between the Sulu Sea on the NW. and the Sea of Celebes on the SE., and stretching from Mindanao on the NE. to Borneo on the SW. Lat. 4° 44′ to 6° 52′ N.; lon. 119° 45′ to 122° E. The archipelago is divided into 6 groups, as follows, in order from the NE.: Basilan, Samales, Sulu (Jolό), Siassi, Kinapussán, and Tawi-Tawi, with Pangutárang to the NW. In all there are about 190 (mostly volcanic) islands, covering somewhat over 1000 sq. m., of which Sulu is chief. The islands are extensively forested with good timber, including teak and sandalwood. Among the products are cocoa- and areca-nuts, bananas, bread-fruit, mangoes, and oranges. The natives raise rice, cacao, maize, and various alimentary roots. Wild boars and deer are common, and oxen, swine, goats, and poultry are abundant. Ambergris is found on the coast, and much resin is obtained from the forest trees. An important article of commerce is the Sulu pearl or pearl shell ("Manila shell"). The natives—chiefly Moros, or Mohammedan Malays—are ruled by chiefs who are nominally under the sway of a despotic sultan. It was not until the latter part of the nineteenth century that Spain succeeded in asserting her sovereignty over the archipelago. In 1899 the Sultan of Sulu recognized the sovereignty of the United States. The Moros were formerly noted for their piracies. Slavery exists in the islands. Pop. of the province in 1903, 51,389. Sumatra, soo-mȧ'tra, the westernmost of the Sunda Islands, and after Borneo the largest island of the Malay Archipelago, forming part of the Dutch East Indies. It lies between lat. 5° 45′ N. and 6° S. and lon. 95° 20′ and 106° E., separated on the NE. from the Malay Peninsula by the Strait of Malacca and on the E. from Java by the Strait of Sunda. Length, from NW. to SE., about 1050 miles. Area estimated at about 180,000 sq. m. (by some authorities placed considerably higher). The island is traversed from NW. to SE. by a more or less continuous range, or series of ranges, of mountains (Menangkabo, Barisan, etc.), many of whose dominating summits are dormant, extinct, or active volcanic cones (Indrapura Peak or Korintji, the culminating point of the island, about 12,400 feet; Mount Ophir, 9600 ft.; Dempo, 10,400 ft.; and Merapi, 9500 ft.). The subcentral position of the mountain axis gives a comparatively narrow western border, with short and barely serviceable water-courses, while on the opposite or eastern side there is a broad and gently falling plain, whose soil is largely composed of the débris of the mountain heights, and across which course many fairly large and navigable rivers (Palembang, Jambi or Batang-hari, Indragiri, Kampar, Siak, and Rakan), on which are located nearly all the more important or populous towns of that section (Palembang, Jambi, Ringat, Pulo Lavang, and Siat). In the NW. part of the island is Lake Toba, a sheet of water several hundred sq. m. in extent. The soil of the island is very fertile, and the greater part of the region is still heavily forested with myrtaceous and ficaceous trees, oaks, guttapercha, camphor, teak, pine, etc. Tropical fruits grow in luxuriance. Of the native fauna some of the most conspicuous members are the elephant, rhinoceros, tapir, tiger, sun-bear, mountain-goat, orang-outang, siamang, and tarsier; and among birds, the argus- and peacock-pheasants. The metals comprise gold, copper, lead, iron, tin, and Tertiary coal (Padang highlands). Some petroleum has also been obtained. The most important of the cultivated products is tobacco. Black pepper is also largely exported. The climate of Sumatra is essentially equatorial in character, with only moderate variations in temperature, and markedly unhealthy over a considerable portion of the lowlands. At elevations of 3000 ft. or more it is both pleasant and salubrious. The average annual temperature on the lowlands is about 80°, with the maximum of heat ordinarily in the months of September and October. The annual rainfall is heavy, amounting in some places (Padang) to upward of 180 inches. There are few roads in the interior, and most of the communication between the different settlements is made by way of the water-courses. The railways have a length of about 200 miles. The population of the island is estimated to be about 3,500,000, mostly natives of a Malayan type. Among the best-known tribes are the Achinese (the inhabitants of Achin in the extreme NW.) and the Battas (or Bataks), who have preserved their independence in the highlands of the northern interior. Mohammedanism is professed largely by the dwellers in the coast regions. The Europeans number about 5000, and there are some 100,000 Chinese, 2500 Arabs, and 7000–10,000 other foreigners. Among the principal towns are Palembang, Benkulen, Padang, and Achin. The Portuguese reached Sumatra about 1508. The Dutch came about 100 years later, and in the course of the seventeenth century they obtained a foothold in the island, establishing trading stations. Towards the close of that century the English established themselves at Benkulen. The subjugation of the island by the Dutch has been a slow process, and it is only within the last few years that they have extended their authority over nearly the whole of it, their last great struggle having been with the Achinese. Benkulen was ceded by the English to the Dutch in 1824.

Sumba, a name of SANDALWOOD ISLAND.

Sumbawa, soom-bȧ'wȧ, one of the Lesser Sunda Islands, Malay Archipelago, lying immediately E. of Lombok, from which it is separated by the Strait of Allas. Area, about 5200 sq. m. It is largely of a comparatively recent (Tertiary) limestone formation, with which, however, are associated a number of volcanoes. The most famous of these, situated on the N. side, is Temboro, about 9050 feet in height, whose eruption in April, 1815, was one of the most catastrophic ever recorded. The island is exceedingly fertile, and produces sandalwood, rice, tobacco, etc. The population is thought by some to reach 150,000. The chief settlements are Sumbawa and Bima.

Sunda (sŭn'dą) Islands, a name of indefinite application, comprising according to some geographers all the islands of the Malay Archipelago extending in a general line from Sumatra to Timor (inclusive of these two) or Timor Laut, and by others made to include in addition Borneo, or Borneo and Celebes. In this broadest acceptation they are divisible into two main groups, the Greater Sunda Islands,—Sumatra, Java, Borneo, and Celebes (with some minor outlying islands, as Biliton),—and the Lesser Sunda Islands,—Bali, Lombok, Sumbawa, Sumba (or Sandalwood), Flores, Timor, etc. They separate the China and Java seas on the N. from the Indian Ocean on the S. Of the intercommunicating passages, the best known is the Strait of Sunda, between Java and Sumatra. Physiographically Bali, which is separated from Lombok by the zoögeographical Wallace's Line, would seem to be Asiatic, while the remaining islands eastward are Australian or Papuan in character. Apart from certain sections in Borneo, virtually the whole region belongs to or is administered by the Netherlands.

It has a number of notable public buildings, a state normal school, St. Mary's Hospital, ship-building yards, breweries, iron-works, foundries and boiler-shops, lumber- and flour-mills, and various other manufactories. It is an important shipping point for iron products, grain, flour, lard, cement, and lumber. Pop. of village in 1887, 3353; of the city in 1890, 11,983; in 1900, 31,091.

Superior, Lake, the largest body of fresh water on the globe, and the most elevated of the five Great Lakes formed in the depressions of the basin of the St. Lawrence River. Somewhat more than a third of its waters is in Ontario, Canada, while the rest belongs to the United States, the states touching its shores being Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan (Upper Peninsula). It is about 360 miles long, measured on a direct line connecting Duluth with the E. extremity. The greatest width is about 160 miles, and the area is computed to be 31,000–32,000 sq. m. The mean depth is estimated to be 900 feet, and the greatest depth is somewhat over 1000 ft. Its surface is about 602 ft. above sea-level. The lake discharges through the St. Mary's River, which issues from the E. extremity, into Lake Huron. The water of Lake Superior is remarkable for its purity and transparency, and abounds in fish, among which are trout and white-fish. The lake receives no large rivers. Its principal tributary is the St. Louis, which enters at the W. end and is the remotest source of the St. Lawrence River. The largest island in the lake is Isle Royale, about 45 miles long, which belongs to Michigan. The waters of Lake Superior are contained in an Archæan rock-basin, which gives unmistakable evidence of having been scoured by glacial ice during the Glacial Period. Prior to that period its outflow, similar to that of the Great Lakes generally, appears to have been directed to the basin of the Mississippi River instead of to that of the St. Lawrence. Its present catchment basin is exceedingly small. The region occupied by the lake is one of the most highly mineralized in the world, the ores of iron and copper seeming to occur in limitless quantities. The southern peninsular projection, known as Keweenaw Point, is a particularly noted copper region. Its position in the line of outlet of the great grain, lumber, and ore regions of the interior of the continent has made the lake one of the largest avenues of shipping in the world, and its outlet (the St. Mary's River and the Sault Ste. Marie canals) passes a vastly larger tonnage than the Suez Canal. The chief ports or shipping points on its shores are Duluth, Superior, Ashland, Ontonagon, Houghton, Marquette, Sault Ste. Marie (on the outlet), and Port Arthur, the last-named being on the line of the direct Canadian rail-steamship route across the continent. On the border of Alger co., Mich., are found the famous "Pictured Rocks," which form variegated bluffs of 50 to 200 feet on the S. shore.

Sur (anc. Tyre [Anglicized form]; L. Tyrus; Gr. Τύρος; Phœnician, Sur,—i.e., "rock"; Hebrew, Tsor), a town of Syria, on the Mediterranean Sea, 46 miles SSW. of Beirut and 24 miles SSW. of Saida (Sidon). It is situated on the N. side of a little peninsula which was originally an islet less than a mile from the shore. The ancient city of Tyre stood partly on this island (less than a square mile in area) and partly on the mainland. On the S. side of the island was the Egyptian port and on the N. side the Sidonian port. The island was converted into a peninsula through the construction by Alexander the Great, in his siege operations, of a great causeway. This isthmus was widened in the course of centuries by accretions of sand thrown up by the sea until it became a broad strip of land. Tyre was one of the greatest maritime city-states of antiquity. At the close of the second millennium B.C. it occupied the foremost place among the Phœnician cities, overshadowing Sidon. Its trade extended beyond the Strait of Gibraltar and it was famous for its industry as well as its commerce. It was celebrated far and wide for its purple dye and its glass-ware. Carthage was a Tyrian colony. The kings of Tyre ruled over a considerable district on the main-land. The city defied the power of the Assyrians and Babylonians and suffered terribly from long sieges. In the sixth century B.C. it became subject to Persia, under whose dominion it declined. When Alexander the Great was destroying the Persian monarchy Tyre dared to withstand him. It fell after a memorable siege in 332 B.C. The city was still of commercial and industrial importance under the Romans and far down into the Middle Ages. A Christian community existed here from the earliest times. In spite of the huge walls which rendered the island stronghold well-nigh impregnable, it fell into the hands of the Crusaders in 1124. It was held by the Christians until 1291, since which time the place has been insignificant. There are but scanty remains of antiquity. The ruins of the church built by the Crusaders are interesting. On the main-land, at Ras-el-Ain, is a great reservoir, and near it are remains of aqueducts. The town of Sur has about 6000 inhabitants, half Christians and half Mohammedans. Its trade is unimportant. It was visited by a destructive earthquake in 1837.

Surat, soo‵rät′, a town of Bombay, British India, capital of Surat district, on the Tapti River, near its mouth in the Gulf of Cambay, 150 miles N. of Bombay. The architectural features of the place include mosques, Hindu and Parsi temples, the palace of the former nawaubs, and the old castle, which occupies a prominent position on the shore. Surat was formerly, for about two centuries, until it was overshadowed by Bombay, a place of great commercial importance, and at the close of the eighteenth century it was accounted one of the most populous cities of Asia. Its harbor has been silted up so that only small vessels can reach the city. There is a roadstead with deep water at Swally (Suwali), about 12 miles distant. The English East India Company established a factory at Surat in 1612. The Dutch and French came later. For a time the city was the principal station of the English East India Company in India. It has been under British rule only since 1800, although the castle was occupied by the British some time before. After a period of utter decline it rose again into prominence at the time of the Civil War in America, when it was a great shipping point for Indian cotton. It has manufactures of textiles, etc. There is a British cantonment here. Pop. in 1901, 118,364.

Susquehanna River, a river chiefly of the state of Pennsylvania, rises, as the North or East Branch, in two minor forks or head-streams, which issue from lakes Schuyler and Otsego, in Otsego co., N.Y., flows generally SW. to the boundary-line of Pennsylvania, crosses that state in a zigzag course from N. to S., and after a short traverse of the northern part of Maryland, discharges into the head of Chesapeake Bay, at Havre de Grace. The river presents the interesting condition, in its traverse of the state of Pennsylvania, of trenching or gapping several ridges of the Appalachian Mountains. In the lower part of its course the river forms the boundary between the cos. of York and Lancaster, Pa. The Susquehanna appears as a noble stream in some of its longer reaches, but most of its course is impeded by rapids and boulders, which render it practically unfit for navigation. It is chiefly utilized for the flotation of lumber. It is crossed in many parts by noble railroad and passenger bridges. The chief affluents of the river are the Chemung, Lackawanna, West Branch, and Juniata. Among the more important towns situated on its banks are Binghamton and Owego, in New York; Pittston, Wilkesbarre, and Harrisburg, in Pennsylvania; and Port Deposit, in Maryland. Total course estimated at 450–500 miles. The West Branch of the Susquehanna River rises on the W. slope of the Appalachian Mountains in the west-central part of Pennsylvania and flows NE., E., and finally S., joining the Susquehanna near Sunbury after a course of nearly 250 miles. Clearfield, Lockhaven, and Williamsport are on its banks.

Sussex (i.e., the country of the South Saxons), a southeastern county of England, bordering on the English Channel, and having Hampshire on the W. and Surrey and Kent on the N. Area, about 1450 sq. m. The ancient co. of Sussex comprises the two modern administrative divisions of East Sussex and West Sussex. The South Downs, a range of chalk hills covered with fine turf, in their most elevated portion between 800 and 900 feet high, traverse the region from W. to E., terminating in the lofty cliff of Beachy Head. In the N. is the fertile tract known as the Weald. Between the Downs and the sea is a strip of fine agricultural land. Among the rivers, which are small, are the Arun, Adur, and Ouse. The climate is mild. Sussex is an agricultural and pastoral county. The Southdown sheep and the Sussex cattle are in high repute. Among the chief towns are Brighton, Chichester, and Hastings. Most of the towns on the coast are resorted to as watering-places in summer. Sussex, not reckoning the parliamentary boroughs, returns 6 members to the House of Commons. Swabia, or Suabia, swā'be-ạ (Ger. Schwaben, shwâ'bẹn), a region in the SW. part of Germany, comprising parts of Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria, together with Hohenzollern. The principal orographic features are the Black Forest and the Swabian Jura. The Danube and the Neckar have their sources here. Among the cities are Augsburg, Ulm, Freiburg, and Constance. The appellation Swabia is derived from that of the Suevi, by which name the Alemanni, who took possession of this part of Germany at the time of the decline of the Roman Empire, were also known. In the Middle Ages Swabia, whose boundaries originally included Alsace and the eastern part of Switzerland, constituted a duchy (known at first as Alemannia). The dukes of Swabia were long among the foremost of the feudal princes of Germany. The duchy was at the height of its power under the house of Hohenstaufen, to which dynasty the emperors Frederick Barbarossa and Frederick II. belonged. After the extinction of this dynasty (1268) the Swabian duchy was resolved into a labyrinthine medley of principalities, petty ecclesiastical states, and city commonwealths. One of the circles into which the German Empire was divided at the beginning of the sixteenth century was called the Swabian circle.

Sweden (Sw. Sverige, svå′re-ghęh; Ger. Schweden, shwå′dęn; Fr. Suède, swaid; L. Suedia), a kingdom of Europe, comprising the E. and larger portion of the Scandinavian peninsula. It is situated between lat. 55° 20′ and 69° 3′ N. and lon. 11° 6′ and 24° 10′ E. It is bounded E. by the Baltic Sea, the Gulf of Bothnia, and Finland, S. by the Baltic, SW. by the Cattegat, and W. by Norway. The greater portion of the boundary with Norway (in the centre and N.) follows approximately the height of land, the Scandinavian Alps or plateau, which forms the water-parting between the streams that flow to the E. and to the W. sides of the peninsula respectively; in the more southerly portion of the boundary this height of land lies within Norwegian territory. The boundary-line with Russia is constituted by the Torneå-Elf and its chief tributary, the Muonio. Area, 172,876 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 5,136,441; estimated for 1903, 5,221,291. Capital, Stockholm.

Sweden consists of 3 main divisions: Svealand, Gothland (Göteland), and Norrland. The first two comprise the southern part of the country, Gothland being in the extreme S. Norrland extends into Lapland and is larger than the other two divisions combined. The kingdom is divided into 24 provinces called läns (the city of Stockholm constituting in addition a separate division).

The following is a list of the läns with their capitals and population at the close of 1900:

Läns.	Capitals.	Pop. in 1900.

Norrbotten	Luleå	134,769

The largest cities are Stockholm, Gothenburg, Malmö, and Norrköping.

Face of the Land.—Sweden necessarily partakes of the general features of the Scandinavian peninsula, being built up almost wholly of the very ancient Archæan and earlier Paleozoic rocks (schists, gneisses, etc.) which characterize that region. But the country, while here and there, close to the Norwegian frontier, rising into lofty elevations (Kebnekaisse, in lat. 67° 52′ N., 6964 (7005?) feet, the culminating point of the kingdom; Sarjektjåkko, in about lat. 67° 14′, 6855 ft.; Kaskasatjåkko, 6809 ft.), is on the whole not mountainous, and rather in the form of an undulating plateau, which by successive terraces falls from the W. eastward into the low-lying Baltic plain. It has been estimated that of the total area upward of 30 per cent. lies under 300 ft. elevation, and only 8 per cent. attains 2000 ft., —a condition markedly different from what obtains in Norway. The mountains themselves do not present the aspect of "backbones" or ridges, being ordinarily only the culmination of the undulating plateau, in part heavily mantled in snow and ice, which has scattered dominating heights or peaks rising above it.

Lakes and Rivers.—Few countries of the world are more extensively watered than Sweden, where it is thought that fully 8 per cent. of the surface is occupied by lakes and rivers. The former in the northern half of the kingdom occupy in the main a zone of 700–1200 feet elevation at closely corresponding distances from the height of land, or Norwegian water-parting, and extend NW. and SE. in narrow troughs corresponding to the direction of flow of all the major streams. The largest of these fjord-like lakes, which seem to have been fashioned by ice-action, are the Stora Lulesjö (in the N.), the Horn-Afvan, and the Storsjö. The more important and larger lakes, which occupy a fracture-depression of the land perhaps structurally related to the Gulf of Finland, lie in the S.,—Mälar, Hjelmar, Vetter, Vener,—and by reason of their low position have permitted of the construction of canalized waters, known conjointly as the Göta Canal, to connect the waters of the Baltic Sea with the Cattegat. Lake Vener, which covers an area of 2100 sq. m., is the third largest lake of Europe, and its chief tributary, the Klar-Elf, the most important stream of all Scandinavia. The natural discharge of Lake Vetter is through the Motala-Elf. Other streams between the Torneå on the N. and the Göta on the SW.—but little serviceable, except in their lower reaches or as affording water-power—are the Luleå, Piteå, Umeå, Angermann, Indals, Ljusne, and Dal, all of which flow SE. to the Gulf of Bothnia. There are extensive marshy tracts along the shores. The coast is deeply indented, forming vast bays and fjords, and studded with a multitude of low sandy islands, the chief of which are Gotland and Öland in the Baltic. The latter, which is separated from the mainland by Kalmar Sound, has good pasture-ground.

Climate.—The climate of Sweden is mild for its northern position, the mean temperature of the year at Stockholm being 43° (January, 24½°, and July, 63°), but on the whole it is much more severe than that of Norway. The summers are very hot and the winters extremely cold. Spring is almost unknown. In the N. the rivers are frozen and snow covers the ground for five or six months in the year; in the central regions winter lasts for three or four months. The mountainous tracts of the centre and N. have the most rigorous winters, with the temperature not infrequently descending nearly to the freezing point of mercury. In Swedish Lapland the summer lasts ordinarily somewhat less than sixty days, from about the fourth week in June to the third week in August, when the ground is again covered with snow and ice. The amount of rain is much less than in Norway. It is heaviest in the regions immediately bordering upon the Cattegat, where an annual precipitation of 35 inches is not exceptional; on the E. coast, on the other hand, as at Kalmar, the fall is in many parts reduced to about 13 inches, the average rainfall for the whole of Sweden being about 20 inches. August is the rainiest of the months. The prevailing winds are SW. and W.

Natural Productions.—The soil is not generally fertile and but a very small area of land is fit for cultivation. In 1902 the area of land actually under cultivation was 8.7 per cent. of the total area, while the forested tracts covered 50 per cent. Barley is cultivated as far N. as lat. 69°. Rye, hemp, and potatoes are grown to lat. 66°. Oats ripen to lat. 63° 30′; wheat and hops cease to be cultivated with advantage beyond lat. 62°. Fruit-trees are almost wholly limited to the region S. of lat. 62°. The cereal crops in the order of their yield are oats, rye, barley, and wheat. Potatoes are very largely cultivated. The principal forest-trees are the pine, fir, and birch, which extend almost to the extreme N. of the country; the lime, elm, ash, willow, and alder, between lat. 61° and 63°; the oak, which grows as far N. as lat. 61°; and beech, which extends to lat. 57°. Rearing of live-stock is an important branch of industry, but the pastures, as a rule, are poor, and the horses and cattle are small, while the sheep yield an inferior wool. N. of lat. 64° the reindeer is virtually the only domestic animal. At the close of 1902 there were registered in Sweden 2,577,409 head of cattle, 1,195,689 sheep, 807,621 pigs, and 542,158 horses. Among wild animals are the bear (now scarce), the wolf, lynx, fox, marten, lemming, hare, and squirrel. Among birds special mention may be made of the different forms of grouse and of the partridge. Fish are abundant on the coasts and in the lakes and rivers.

The mineral resources of Sweden are very great and mining has developed into one of the chief industries of the country. Iron-ore is especially abundant and yields the finest metal. The deposits of Gellivare, in the N., are especially famous for both quantity and quality. The richest copper-mines are at Falun; zinc is obtained at Ammeberg, and silver at Sala. Gold is produced only to a small extent. The other mineral products are silver, alum, manganese, zinc, sulphate of iron, cobalt, and coal of inferior quality in Scania. The quantity of ore mined in 1903 was: iron, 3,677,520 tons; zinc, 62,927 tons; copper, 36,687 tons; silver and lead, 9792 tons; manganese, 2244 tons; and sulphur pyrites, 7793 tons. The quantity of coal mined in 1903 was 320,390 tons. The total number of persons engaged in mining in 1903 was 30,731.

Transportation, Railways.—The means of communication are almost everywhere good, the natural highways adding very materially to this condition. In 1903 the length of railways in operation was 7631 miles. Regular steamboat communication is maintained during the ice-free months on several of the larger southern lakes, and on the Trolhätta-Göta system of canals, which unites the Baltic and the Cattegat.

Industries.—Among the chief industries of Sweden, apart from mining, are lumbering and the manufacture of wood products, the smelting of iron and the production of steel, flour-milling, sugar-refining, distilling and brewing, cotton- and wool-weaving, and the manufacture of paper and paper-pulp, machinery, margarine, tobacco, etc. The leading exports are, in order of their importance, mineral ores, grain and flour, metal goods and machinery, raw textile materials and yarn, textiles, groceries, live-stock, and animal food, hair, hides, and other animal products.

Government, People, etc.—Sweden is a constitutional monarchy. The parliament, or diet, consists of two chambers, both elected by the people. The members of the First Chamber are elected for a term of 9 years by the provincial representative bodies (Landstings), or, in the case of a few of the principal cities, by the municipal corporations. The members of the Second Chamber are elected for a term of 3 years, about one-third by the towns and two-thirds by the rural districts. In the larger towns they are chosen by direct election; in the smaller towns and rural districts by direct or indirect election, according to the will of the majority (direct election being the rule). The suffrage is greatly restricted by property-income qualifications. Sweden has a thoroughly homogeneous population, the non-Swedish elements comprising only about 1 per cent. of the inhabitants. The Finns number about 20,000 and there are about 6000 Lapps. The Swedes constitute the most numerous branch of the Scandinavian peoples, the northern branch of the Teutonic race. They are nearly all Lutherans and the Evangelical Lutheran church is the established religion. The number of Jews is about 3500. At the head of the educational institutions are the universities of Upsala and Lund. There are hardly any illiterates in the country. The national army amounts on a peace footing to between 35,000 and 40,000 men and officers. The navy, maintained for coast-defence, comprises about 10 armored vessels.

History.—The history of Sweden begins to emerge from obscurity about 1000 years ago, at the time when the Norse Vikings figure as the terror of Europe. It was long after this that the two Teutonic peoples who disputed the possession of the eastern half of the Scandinavian Peninsula—Swedes and Goths—were welded into one nation. Christianity did not completely gain the upper hand until the twelfth century. Soon after this we find the Swedes masters of Finland. In 1397 the so-called Union of Kalmar was brought about by Queen Margaret, daughter of Valdemar IV. of Denmark, by which the crowns of the three Scandinavian kingdoms were to remain permanently united. In 1521 Gustavus Vasa headed a rising against the Danes, and in 1523 he became king of Sweden. Denmark retained possession of the southern part of the country. In 1529 Lutheranism was established as the state church. In 1561 Esthonia passed into the possession of Sweden. Early in the seventeenth century Sweden rose to the position of one of the great powers of Europe through the genius of Gustavus Adolphus, the grandson of Gustavus Vasa. After wresting Ingria and Karelia from Russia, and Livonia from Poland, he became the successful champion of Teutonic Protestantism in the Thirty Years' war. The Peace of Westphalia, in the reign of his daughter Christina, assigned to Sweden part of Pomerania, Wismar, the sees of Bremen and Verden, etc., the sovereign of Sweden being admitted to representation in the Germanic body. Soon after, in 1658, Denmark was forced to relinquish her possessions in the Swedish part of the Scandinavian Peninsula; Sweden was mistress of the Baltic. Through the victories of Charles XII. at the beginning of the eighteenth century, Sweden, against whom Russia, Poland, and Denmark had united, brilliantly asserted her position as the great power of the North. But Charles's career of conquest was brief. While he was fighting Poland, Peter the Great was establishing his dominion on the shores of the Baltic, and the disaster at Poltava in 1709 marked the sudden collapse of the Swedish power. Livonia and Esthonia became Russian possessions, and to these Ingria and Karelia were soon added. In 1720 Sweden had to cede part of Pomerania to Prussia. In 1808 Russia conquered Finland. In 1814 Denmark was forced to cede Norway to Sweden, receiving in exchange the small Swedish territory in Pomerania. The Congress of Vienna (1814–15) confirmed the king of Sweden in the possession of Norway (which had resisted the union) and recognized Russia's title to Finland. In the course of the Napoleonic wars all the German possessions of Sweden had passed out of her hands. The crowns of Sweden and Norway remained united for 90 years, Norway retaining her national parliament and being governed by her own laws. In 1905 Norway dissolved the union in a revolutionary way.

Sweden, a post-township (town) of Oxford co., Me., about 45 miles NW. of Portland. Pop. in 1900, 282.

Sweden, a post-village in Sweden township (town), Monroe co., N.Y., about 18 miles W. of Rochester. Pop. of the town (which contains Brockport) in 1900, 4743.

Sweden, a post-township of Potter co., Pa., about 25 miles NE. of Emporium. Pop. in 1900, 612.

Sweden Valley, a post-village of Potter co., Pa. The banking point is Coudersport. Pop. 150.

Swedesboro, sweedz'bŭr-rŭh, a banking post-village of Gloucester co., N.J., at the head of sloop navigation on Raccoon Creek, 11 miles SW. of Woodbury, on the West Jersey and Seashore R. It has a foundry, glass-works, etc. Pop. about 1200.

Swedesburg, a post-village of Henry co., Iowa, 10 miles N. of Mount Pleasant. Pop. 75.

Swedish Deep, a name given to the deepest part of the East Greenland Sea, in about lat. 78° N., and W. of Spitzbergen. Depth, 2650 fathoms (15,900 feet).

Swedona, swe-do'nạ, a post-village of Mercer co., Ill., about 17 miles S. by E. of Rock Island. Pop. in 1900, 111.

Sweetair, a post-village of Baltimore co., Md., about 20 miles N. by E. of Baltimore. Pop. 150.

Sweet Chalybeate (kạ-lĭb'e-āt), a post-village and summer-resort of Alleghany co., Va., 9 miles S. of Alleghany station. Here are mineral springs. Pop. 75.

Sweet Grass, a county in the S. part of Montana. Area, 2887 sq. m. It is drained by the Yellowstone River and Stillwater Creek. Capital, Big Timber. Pop. in 1900, 3086.

Sweethall, a post-hamlet of King William co., Va., 31 miles E. of Richmond.

Sweet Home, a post-village of Pulaski co., Ark., on the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern R. The banking point is Little Rock. Pop. 250.

Sweet Home, a post-station of Iredell co., N.C.

Sweet Home, a post-village of Linn co., Oregon, 22 miles ENE. of Halsey. Pop. 130.

Sweet Home, a post-village of Lavaca co., Tex., 18 miles S. of Flatonia, on the San Antonio and Aransas Pass R. Pop. about 300.

Sweetland, a post-village of Nevada co., Cal., 12 miles NW. of Nevada City. Pop. about 60.

Sweetland, a post-township of Muscatine co., Iowa. Pop. in 1900, 1188.

Sweetlips, a post-station of Chester co., Tenn.

Sweetowen, a post-hamlet of Owen co., Ky., about 60 miles ENE. of Louisville.

Sweetsburgh, a post-village of Missisquoi co., Quebec, on the Canadian Pacific R., 57 miles SE. of Montreal. Pop. in 1900, 255.

Sweetsers, sweet'zẹrz, a post-village of Grant co., Ind., on the Chicago, Cincinnati and Louisville and the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis Rs., 6 miles W. of Marion. Pop. about 400.

Sweetsprings, a banking city and resort of Saline co., Mo., on the Missouri Pacific R., 23 miles NW. by N. of Sedalia. It exports medicinal waters. Pop. in 1900, 1080.

Sweetsprings, a post-village and summer-resort of Monroe co., W.Va., is pleasantly situated near the Alleghany Mountains, about 12 miles S. by E. of the White Sulphur Springs. Pop. about 300.

Sweet Valley, a post-village of Luzerne co., Pa., 16 miles WNW. of Wilkesbarre. Pop. 250.

Sweetwater, a southern county of Wyoming, bordering on Utah. Area, 10,510 sq. m. It is drained by the Green River and its tributaries. Gold and large deposits of Tertiary coal are found in the county. Capital, Green River. Pop. in 1890, 4941; in 1900, 8455.

Sweetwater, a post-village of Marengo co., Ala. Pop. 100.

Sweetwater, a post-station of Gwinnett co., Ga., about 26 miles NE. of Atlanta.

Sweetwater, a post-village of Menard co., Ill., about 20 miles N. of Springfield. Pop. 150.

Sweetwater, a post-station of Buffalo co., Neb.

Sweetwater, a post-village of Esmeralda co., Nev., about 70 miles S. by E. of Virginia City.

Sweetwater, a post-village of Watauga co., N.C. Pop. 75.

Sweetwater, a banking post-town of Monroe co., Tenn., on the Southern R., 42 miles SW. of Knoxville. It has woollen- and hosiery-mills. Pop. in 1900, 1716.

Sweetwater, a banking post-town, capital of Nolan co., Tex., on the Texas and Pacific R., 60 miles W. of Callahan. It has cotton-seed oil mills. Pop. in 1900, 670.

Sweetwater, a post-village of Sweetwater co., Wis. See ROCK SPRINGS.

Sweetwater River, Wyo., rises in the southern end of the Wind River Mountains. It crosses the Rocky Mountains at the South Pass, runs eastward, and enters the North Fork of the Platte River near lat. 42° 30′ N., lon. 106° 50′ W. It is about 175 miles long.

Sweetwine, a post-station of Hamilton co., Ohio, on the Ohio River, 12 miles above Cincinnati.

Swel'lendam', or Zwellendam, zwĕl'lĕn-dăm', a town of Cape Colony, capital of a division of the same name, 115 miles E. of Cape Town and 2 miles from the foot of the Lange Bergen. It is one of the oldest towns of Cape Colony. Pop. about 2000. Altitude, 500 feet.

Swengel, swĕng'gẹl, a post-hamlet of Union co., Pa.

Swenoda, a post-township of Swift co., Minn. Pop. in 1900, 515.

Swepsonville, a post-hamlet of Alamance co., N.C., on the Haw River, 6 miles from Haw River station.

Swetnam, a post-village of Fairfax co., Va. Pop. 80.

Sweveghem, swā′vẹh-ghĕm‘, a village of Belgium, in West Flanders, 27 miles S. by E. of Bruges.

Swevezeele, swā′vẹh-zā‘lẹh, a village of Belgium, in West Flanders, 10 miles S. of Bruges.

Swift, a county in the W. part of Minnesota, has an area of 740 sq. m. It is intersected by the Chippewa, Minnesota, and Pomme de Terre rivers. Capital, Benson. Pop. in 1890, 10,161; in 1900, 13,503.

Swift, a post-village of Elbert co., Ga. The banking point is Elberton. Pop. 100.

Swift Creek, N.C., enters the Tar River about 5 miles NW. of Tarboro. It is about 70 miles long.

Swift Creek, N.C., rises in Pitt co. and enters the Neuse River in Craven co.

Swift Creek, S.C., flows into the Wateree River near the NW. extremity of Sumter co.

Swift Creek, Hardin co., Tenn., flows into the Tennessee River.

Swift Creek, in the SE. part of Virginia, unites with the Appomattox a few miles below Petersburg.

Swift Current, a post-village of Assiniboia, Canada, on the Canadian Pacific R., 112 miles from Moosejaw. Pop. 150.

Swift Falls, a post-hamlet of Swift co., Minn., on a branch of the Chippewa River, 11 miles NE. of Benson.

Swift Island, a post-station of Montgomery co., N.C.

Swifton, a post-town of Jackson co., Ark., on the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern R., 101 miles NE. of Little Rock. Pop. in 1900, 206.

Swift River, Mass., unites with the Chicopee River at Three Rivers, 16 miles ENE. of Springfield.

Swift River, N.H., enters the Saco River near Conway, in Carroll co.

Swift River, a post-hamlet of Hampshire co., Mass., on the Westfield River, about 22 miles E. of Pittsfield.

Swiftwater, a post-village of Grafton co., N.H. The banking point is Woodsville or Wells River, Vt. Pop. 200.

Swiftwater, a post-village and resort of Monroe co., Pa. The banking point is Stroudsburg or East Stroudsburg.

Swilly, Lough (lŏh), an inlet of the Atlantic Ocean, in the N. part of Ireland, co. of Donegal, extends inland 25 miles S. It receives the river Swilly.

Swinburn, a post-village of Shawnee co., Kan., is a rural free delivery of Silverlake.

Swindon, a municipal borough of England, in Wiltshire, 29 miles ENE. of Bath. It consists of Old Swindon and New Swindon, the latter containing the great bulk of the inhabitants. In New Swindon are extensive railway-shops. Pop. in 1901, 45,006.

Swineford, a town of Ireland, co. of Mayo, 15½ miles ENE. of Castlebar. Pop. about 1500.

Swineford, a banking post-village of Snyder co., Pa.

Swinemünde, swēe′nẹh-mün‘dẹh, a strongly fortified town of Prussia, in Pomerania, 36 miles NNW. of Stettin, on the island of Usedom, and on the Swine, one of the channels connecting the Stettiner Haff with the Baltic Sea. Ship-building is carried on and there are valuable fisheries. Swinemünde is the outport of Stettin, and large numbers of vessels enter and clear the port annually. The town is a fashionable sea-bathing resort. Pop. in 1900, 10,251.

Swineshead, a town of England, co. of Lincoln, 6 miles SW. of Boston. Pop. about 1500.

Swinton, a town of England, co. of York, West Riding, 5 miles NNE. of Rotherham. It has manufactures of iron, glass, and pottery. Pop. in 1901, 12,217.

Swinton and Pendlebury, a town of Lancashire, England, 5 miles NW. of Manchester. The inhabitants are largely engaged in the cotton-industry, brick-making, and coal-mining. Pop. in 1901, 27,005.

Swisher, a county of the NW. part of Texas, traversed by the Red River. Area, 850 sq. m. Capital, Tulia. Pop. in 1900, 1227.

Swisher, a post-village of Dewitt co., Ill. The banking point is Clinton. Pop. 250.

Swiss, a post-station of Gasconade co., Mo.

Swiss Alp, a post-station of Fayette co., Tex.

Swissvale, a banking post-borough of Allegheny co., Pa., on the Monongahela River and on the Pennsylvania R., 8 miles ESE. of Pittsburg. It has manufactures of railroad switches and signals, lamps, etc. Pop. in 1900, 1716.

Switz City, a post-village of Greene co., Ind., 6 miles W. of Bloomfield, on the Illinois Central and other railroads, 38 miles NE. of Vincennes. Pop. 250.

Switzer, a post-village of Franklin co., Ky., on the Frankfort and Cincinnati R. The banking point is Frankfort. Pop. 250.

Switzer, a post-hamlet of Lehigh co., Pa.

Switzerland (Ger. Schweiz, shwīts; Fr. Suisse, sweess; L. Helvetia), a federal republic of central Europe, situated between lat. 45° 50′ and 47° 50′ N. and lon. 5° 58′ and 10° 28′ E., bounded on the N. by Alsace and Baden (separated from the latter for the most part by the Rhine), NE. by Württemberg and Bavaria, from which it is separated by the Lake of Constance, E. by Vorarlberg and Tyrol, S. by Italy and France (Haute-Savoie), and W. by France. The Alps extend along the entire Italian boundary, except for short intervals made by extension into Switzerland of lakes Maggiore and Lugano, and they, together with Lake Geneva, likewise form the SW. boundary with France. The greater part of the western boundary with France is constituted by the Jura Mountains. Area, 15,976 sq. m. Pop. in 1890, 2,917,754; in 1900, 3,315,443. The federation is composed of 22 cantons, 3 of which are divided into half cantons. The following is a list, with the capitals and populations in 1900:

Cantons.	Capitals.	Pop. in 1900.
Aargau	Aarau	206,498
Appenzell Inner Rhodes	Appenzell	13,499
Appenzell Outer Rhodes	Herisau	55,281
Basel-Stadt ("city")	Basel	112,227
Basel-Land ("country")	Liestal	68,497
Bern (Berne)	Bern	589,433
Fribourg (Freiburg)	Fribourg	127,951
St. Gall (Sankt Gallen)	St. Gall	250,285
Geneva (Genève)	Geneva	132,609

There are 3 cities with a population exceeding 100,000: Zürich, Basel, and Geneva.

Relief of the Land.—Physiographically, Switzerland is broadly marked out into 3 well-defined areas, which follow one another zonally and in SW. and NE. trends. These are: the Jura Mountains on the W. and NW., the great mountain-masses of the complex Alpine system in the centre and S., and the so-called Swiss Plateau or plain that lies between these two at general elevations of from 1000 to 3000 feet, and extends from Lake Geneva on the SW. to the Lake of Constance on the NE. A further geological classification divides the Alpine system into a northerly or limestone division, with many prominent minor elevations, and the more southerly division of the crystalline series, containing the giants of the Bernese Oberland and of the Pennine and Lepontine Alps, and comprising nearly the entire mass of central and southern Switzerland. Considerably more than one-half of the area of the federation is occupied by the Alps, whose outer ramifications extend far into France, Italy, Austria-Hungary, and Bavaria. For the general characters of these mountains (their higher summits, glaciers, passes, etc.), which are, indeed, those of the major part of Switzerland itself, see the article Alps. The loftiest summit of all Switzerland is Monte Rosa (Dufour-Spitze), standing a short distance off from the boundary-line of the canton of Valais and Piedmont, 15,215 ft. high. Other lofty summits are the Matterhorn (14,780 ft.), Finsteraarhorn (14,025 ft.), Weisshorn (14,804 ft.), Breithorn (13,685 ft.), Dôme, Jungfrau (13,670 ft.), Mönch, Eiger, Piz Bernina (13,295 ft.), Schreckhorn (13,385 ft.), Wetterhorn (12,150 ft.), Blümlisalphorn (12,040 ft.), etc. Mont Blanc (15,782 ft.), which forms such a striking object as seen from many parts of Switzerland, lies wholly without the Swiss domain (in France and Italy). Among the more notable semi-detached mountain-systems or summits are those of the Stockhorn, WSW. of the lake of Thun (7195 ft.), Niesen (S. of Lake Thun), Pilatus and Rigi (both on the Lake of Lucerne, and respectively 6995 ft. and 5905 ft. in height), and Faulhorn, N. of Grindelwald. One of the most striking features of the Alpine mass of Switzerland is constituted by the deeply incised double valley which forms the basins of the upper Rhone and the upper Rhine, and which in a nearly rectilinear trend traverses the land from SW. to NE. The central point of departure of these two long valleys is approximately the Furka Mountain (or Saddle), with a height of 7990 ft., across which is carried the Furka military road, the highest wagon-road of Switzerland. Another deeply-incised valley, having a trend nearly parallel with that of the Rhein (Vorder Rhein) is the Engadine (Upper and Lower), or valley of the Inn. The highest points of the Jura Mountains in Switzerland are the Dôle and Mont Tendre (5500 ft.). All the mountains of Switzerland exceeding 8500–9000 ft. in height are covered during the whole or the greater part of the year with snow, and the perpetual snow-cap, which gives origin to hundreds of glaciers, seems to be on some of the summits (Jungfrau, Piz Bernina) not less than 300–350 ft. in thickness. The largest continuous nêvês or firns are those that cover the giants of the Bernese Oberland and the Monte Rosa-Matterhorn groups of mountains. Among the glaciers descending from these firns are the Aletsch (about 13 miles in length, the largest in the Alps), Gorner, Rhone, and Grindelwald (Upper and Lower). The most famous of the Alpine passes that lie partly in Switzerland are, beginning at the west, the Great St. Bernard (height, 8110 ft.), Simplon, St. Gotthard, San Bernardino, Splügen, and Bernina (7575 ft.). The St. Gotthard and Simplon mountains are now bored with railway tunnels and most of the diligence service over the mountains has ceased.

Rivers and Lakes.—The rivers of Switzerland are numerous, but they are serviceable for navigation only where their courses traverse or expand into lakes. The drainage of the land is effected by the Rhine to the North Sea, by the Rhone to the Mediterranean, by the Ticino to the Po and the Adriatic, and by the Inn to the Danube and Black Sea. The Rhone traverses Lake Geneva (or Leman); the Rhine, Lake Constance; the Linth, Lake Zürich; the Reuss, Lake Lucerne; the Aar, lakes Thun and Brienz; and the Thièle (Zihl), rising as the Orbe, lakes Neuchâtel and Bienne. Other streams not already named are the Thur, Emmen, Limmat (as the outflow from Lake Zürich is called), and Simme. No country in Europe except Scandinavia has in proportion to its size so many lakes as Switzerland. Those of the Alpine regions, famed for their magnificent scenery, occupy the lower parts of the valleys. They are situated mostly at elevations of from 1200 to upward of 1800 ft. above the sea; the chief of these are the lakes of Geneva (the largest of the Swiss lakes, with an area of 224 sq. m.; elevation, 1220 ft.), Brienz, Thun (1840 ft.), Lucerne (1435 ft.), Zug, Wallensee, Zürich (1340 ft.), Constance (area, 207 sq. m.), and on the S. of the Alps Lago di Lugano (900 ft.), and Lago Maggiore (636 ft.). Most of these are traversed by steamboats. The table-land contains the lakes of Morat, Sempach, Baldegg, Hallwyl, Greifensee, and Pfäffikon. In the Jura are the lakes of Neuchâtel and Bienne. Many of the Swiss lakes, perhaps even the largest and deepest, owe their origin to glacial scour and excavation; others are distinctly the result of damming by morainic or other material. Lake Geneva has a depth of 1095 ft.; Lake Zürich, 1340 ft.; Constance, 1305 ft.; and Lucerne, only 700 ft.

Climate, Vegetation, Agriculture, etc.—The climate of Switzerland is largely influenced by the general elevation of the land and by the presence of mountain-bulwarks as a check to the free flow of winds. A diminished temperature and an abnormal fall of rain in most regions render it not particularly favorable to agriculture. It is on the whole salubrious, and above elevations of 3000 to 5000 feet, or even less, the atmosphere is singularly pure and free from microbic germs and dust. On the plateau or middle section of the country the average January temperature varies between about 32° and 26°, and the July temperature between 68° and 62°; at St. Beatenberg, at an elevation of 3775 ft., the mean summer temperature is reduced to 57°, and on the Rigi-Kulm, 5905 ft., to 48°. The average fall of temperature is about 1° for every 300–350 ft. of ascent. Extremes of summer heat or winter cold are of rare occurrence, and while there is a heavier and more frequent fall of snow in the mountainous tracts than, perhaps, in any other country of Europe, the larger lakes are only exceptionally frozen over, and spring weather frequently comes in with the early or middle days of February. The average annual rainfall varies greatly according to location. The number of rainy days in the mountainous tracts is unusually high and particularly annoying to the traveller or sight-seer. The annual precipitation ranges in many parts from 60 to 90 inches, depending upon elevation, the trend of the mountain-ridges, etc. At Geneva, on the other hand, the fall is hardly 33 inches, and in sections of the canton of Valais it may be very much less (20 inches). Of the winds characteristic of the country may be mentioned the Föhn or Swiss sirocco, a dry, hot wind, which descends with impetuosity over the northern slopes of the Alps, and is frequently a precursor of heavy storms, and the Bise, a local wind of western Switzerland, which sweeps southward over the crests of the Jura Mountains and depresses the temperature by many degrees.

In its climatic and floral aspects Switzerland is frequently divided into three zones: 1, the basal or hill zone, comprised between about 1000 and 2600 feet elevation, a region of generally mild temperature, in which the chestnut and walnut flourish luxuriantly, and to which belong border tracts of the principal lakes; 2, the mountainous or middle zone, between 2600 ft. and 4000 ft., where the coniferous trees are largely added to those of the ordinary deciduous type, and in which are located many of the more noted health-resorts; and 3, the upper or Alpine zone, between 4000 ft. and about 7000 ft., which marks the virtual disappearance of trees and the appearance of the upland meadows and pastures, frequently decked with a luxuriant growth of flowering plants (gentian, Alpine rose, heath, blue-bell, saxifrage, etc.). In this zone, to which succeeds, after a brief interval, the region of perpetual snows, are situated the famous health and high-mountain resorts of Davos (about 5100 ft.), the Rigi (Rigi-Staffel, Rigi-Scheideck, Rigi-Kulm, 5200–5900 ft.), Mürren (5400 ft.), Pontresina (5900 ft.), Silvaplana (5900 ft.), St. Moritz (6000 ft.), Belalp (7100 ft.), and Riffel-Alp (7300 ft.). Of the total area of the federation it is estimated that somewhat over 70 per cent. is productive, and of this amount about 35½ per cent. is under grass and meadow, 29½ per cent. under forest, 18½ per cent. under fruit, and 16½ per cent. under crops and gardens. Rye, oats, and potatoes are the chief crops, but the production is not sufficient to meet the demands of the people, and most of the produce is imported. The leading agricultural industries are the manufacture of cheese (Gruyère or Emmenthal, Neuchâtel, Simmenthal) and condensed milk, the exports of which reach nearly all the civilized countries of the globe. The preparation of milk-chocolates has also become an important industry. The vine is largely cultivated in the lower sun-exposed tracts, between 800 and 1800 ft., and in few countries are the vineyards better cared for than in Switzerland. The fig and olive grow freely in the cantons which descend to the Italian plains.

The principal wealth of Switzerland consists in its rich and excellent pastures, which in summer support vast numbers of cattle; the finest breeds are those of the Simmenthal, Gessenay, Gruyère, Zug, and Schwyz. There were in Switzerland in 1901, 1,340,375 cattle, 219,438 sheep, and 354,634 goats. The silk-worm is reared in the valleys S. of the Alps and also in some parts of the N. But little of the larger game of the land now remains. The chamois, once so abundant among the higher vales and crags, is but rarely seen, and its very existence is determined by the enforcement of state laws looking to its protection. The lammergeyer, or bearded vulture of the Alps, still inhabits the highest mountains. Fish of excellent quality abound in the lakes and rivers. Switzerland, except for deposits of asphalt found in parts of the Jura Mountains (Val de Travers, etc.), its salt and mineral springs, has little mineral wealth. Iron is found in the mountains generally, but chiefly in the Jura; there are mines of lead and zinc in Grisons. Turf is abundant in the marshy districts and coal is found in the table-land. The principal salt springs are at Bex, in the valley of the Rhone. The country contains hundreds of mineral springs.

Manufactures.—Switzerland has made rapid progress in the manufacturing industry. There were in 1901 altogether 6080 factories, giving employment to 242,534 hands. The leading manufactures are those of textiles, leather, foodstuffs, chemicals, wood-work, metals, machinery, paper, watches, jewelry, etc. Cotton goods are made chiefly in Appenzell and St. Gall. Silks are woven in Zürich and Basel, and linens at Bern. Neuchâtel has superior printing establishments. Switzerland holds a notable position in the manufacture of watches, musical-boxes, embroideries and laces (St. Gall), and objects of carved wood. Beer is an important product (228 breweries in 1902) and the distilling of liquors and methylated spirits is a considerable industry.

Communication, etc.—Switzerland is provided with splendid highways, the mountain roads, especially, being maintained in a rare degree of perfection. There were in 1902 2727 miles of railway in operation, many of the railway lines, in their ascent of mountains and penetration through long mountain-tunnels, exhibiting in their construction an amount of engineering skill which is perhaps presented in no other country. Numerous mountain railways, of various styles of construction, have opened up much of the higher and less accessible regions to the tourist. Among the most noted of these are the Rigi, Pilatus, Brienz-Rothhorn, Rochers de Naye, Gorner Grat (10,290 ft.), and Jungfrau railways, the last named projected to reach the summit of this magnificent mountain. A meteorological station has been established on Monte Rosa at a height of about 15,000 ft.

Education.—Switzerland has long been noted for the excellence of its educational institutions, both in the higher and the lower spheres of instruction, and its schools attract great numbers of foreign students. The number of private day-schools and pensionnats is very large. The leading institutions of learning are the six universities of Bern, Geneva, Zürich, Lausanne, Basel, and Fribourg, the Polytechnic School of Zürich, and the academy of Neuchâtel. Attendance at school (the school age varying in the different cantons) is made obligatory by the state.

People, Language, Religion.—The Swiss nationality represents in great measure the admixture of the blood of the ancient Helvetians (a Celtic people) and of the Rhætians (perhaps akin to the Etruscans), both of which peoples were more or less Romanized, with the blood of the Germanic invaders of the Roman Empire. The German language is the dominant speech throughout the country except in the W. (which is French), the extreme S. (which is Italian and French), and the extreme E. (which is largely Romansh). French is spoken by a majority of the people in the cantons of Fribourg, Vaud, Neuchâtel, and Geneva. Ticino is an Italian canton, and Italian prevails in part of Grisons. In Grisons the Romansh-speaking inhabitants comprise about two-fifths of the population, being but slightly outnumbered by the Germans. The cantons in which the German element is numerically least important are Vaud and Geneva. According to the census of 1900 the Protestants numbered 1,916,157; the Roman Catholics, 1,379,664; the Jews, 12,264. The Protestants are in a majority in Aargau, Appenzell Outer Rhodes, Basel, Bern, Glarus, Grisons, Neuchâtel, Schaffhausen, Thurgau, Vaud, and Zürich, predominating most largely in Appenzell Outer Rhodes, Bern, Neuchâtel, and Vaud. The Catholics are in a majority in Appenzell Inner Rhodes, Fribourg, Geneva, Lucerne, St. Gall, Schwyz, Solothurn, Ticino, Unterwalden, Uri, Valais, and Zug. Appenzell Inner Rhodes, Lucerne, Schwyz, Ticino, Unterwalden, Uri, Valais, and Zug are almost wholly Catholic.

Government.—Switzerland is a confederation of little republics, each governed by its own constitution and laws. The legislative powers are vested in the Bundesversammlung (Federal Assembly), consisting of two houses, the Ständerat (Council of the States) and the Nationalrat (National Council). In the Ständerat the cantons as such are represented each by 2 members. The mode of choosing members of this body is left to the individual cantons, and each canton is at liberty to determine the tenure of its representatives. The Nationalrat is a house of representatives elected by universal suffrage for a term of 3 years on the basis of 1 member to every 20,000 of the inhabitants. The executive power is vested in the Bundesrat (Federal Council). It consists of 7 members chosen by the Federal Assembly for a term of 3 years. The president of the Federal Council, who is president of the confederation, is chosen by the Federal Assembly and serves 1 year. He is not eligible for the succeeding year. The Federal Council is constituted as a cabinet of ministers, each member being at the head of a specific administrative department of the government. Bern is the capital of the confederation. The seat of the federal supreme court is Lausanne. In most of the cantons the legislative power is vested in a Grosser Rat (Great Council). A few of the smaller cantons dispense with a legislative body, a primary assembly of all the voters (Landsgemeinde) being held. In each canton there is an executive council. A peculiar feature of the government in the Swiss cantons is the referendum, or practice of submitting laws and measures to the voters for approval or rejection. The referendum is also a feature of the federal constitution. Coupled with the referendum is the initiative, the right of the people to draw up their own measures and have them submitted to the electorate by the legislature.

History.—At the dawn of history the Helvetians inhabited the western part of Switzerland and the Rhætians dwelt in the E. The Romans made themselves masters of the country in the first century B.C. The Roman dominion lasted about four centuries. In the tide of German invasion which swept away the Western Roman Empire the Alemanni and Burgundians took possession of Switzerland. The Alemanni succumbed to the power of the Franks in 496 and the Burgundians in 534. Under the Franks a new civilization was introduced, established largely on a foundation of vigorous Christianity. After the dissolution of the great Frankish realm (close of the ninth century) the principal part of Switzerland was included in the duchy of Alemannia (Swabia), one of the great feudal states of the German kingdom, while the SW. part belonged to the kingdom of Transjurane Burgundy. Early in the eleventh century the dominions of the kingdom of Arles, the realm formed out of the two Burgundian kingdoms (Cisjurane and Transjurane Burgundy), was taken possession of by the German emperor Conrad II., and from this time the whole of Switzerland was included in the Holy Roman (German) Empire. As part of this great labyrinthine fabric Switzerland embraced a medley of petty states, ruled by dukes, counts, bishops, and abbots, together with little city-states, which expanded into cantonal commonwealths. In the thirteenth century the powerful house of Hapsburg overshadowed every other authority. In 1276 Rudolph of Hapsburg, who in 1273 had been elected German emperor, brought the duchy of Austria (with Styria, etc.) under the sway of his house, whose power soon threatened the liberties of the Swiss. To resist its aggressions the three Forest Cantons of Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden in 1291 entered into a league which was the beginning of the Swiss Confederation. In the course of the fourteenth century Lucerne, Zürich, Glarus, Zug, and Bern were added to the league. The house of Hapsburg was unable to cope with the invincible mountaineers. At the close of the Middle Ages the connection of Switzerland with the German Empire came virtually to an end. The confederation was enlarged by fresh accessions, and the area subject to the Swiss was expanded in the early part of the sixteenth century by the acquisition of Italian districts and the conquest of the Pays de Vaud from Savoy by the Bernese. About this time Geneva shook off the authority of the dukes of Savoy, as well as that of its bishops. The revolt against the Church was inaugurated in Switzerland almost simultaneously with the beginning of the Reformation in Germany. In the Peace of Westphalia (1648) Switzerland was formally declared independent of the German Empire. In 1798 the French occupied the country and established the Helvetic Republic. In 1803 Napoleon restored the cantonal confederation, new cantons being added to the original ones. The Congress of Vienna in 1815 decreed the perpetual neutrality of Switzerland. In 1847 there was a civil war, growing out of the efforts of the Protestants to expel the Jesuits, in which the Catholic cantons, united in a league called the Sonderbund, were vanquished by the federal forces.

Sydney, the capital of the British colony of New South Wales, the chief naval station of Australia, and next to Melbourne the most important commercial emporium of the British possessions in the southern seas, is situated on the southern shores of Port Jackson, 5 miles from the entrance of the harbor. Lat. of observatory, 33° 51′ 41″ S.; lon. 151° 12′ 23″ E. It is the oldest city in Australia, having been founded in 1788 by Captain Arthur Phillip, who had been despatched by the imperial government to establish a penal settlement in this remote region. It occupies a site of rare beauty and picturesqueness. The harbor is quite landlocked, with deep water to the edge of its rocky shores, and is defended by modern fortifications. Railway lines extend in several directions into the interior, and there is direct steamship connection with nearly all the important ports of the Pacific and Indian oceans, as well as with many ports of the Atlantic and Mediterranean waters. The old part of the town, which was originally known as Sydney Cove, is fast disappearing, and it has given place to a handsome modern city with numerous public and private buildings, spacious gardens and promenades, and a general aspect not unlike that of the more attractive capitals of Europe. The centre of the inner city is occupied by Hyde Park, from which, leading to the bay, is Macquarie Street, with the government building, parliament house, mint, city library, and other notable buildings and institutions. In virtual continuity with Hyde Park are the opens which unite with the extensive grounds of the botanical garden. Among the most prominent buildings or institutions of the city are the University of Sydney, in Victoria Park, which was founded in 1850, and has an attendance of about 750 students; the national art gallery, Australian Museum, Macleay Museum of National History, the metropolitan Cathedral of St. Andrew, Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. Mary, land-office building, etc. Sydney is the seat of the government geological survey of the colony, and among its scientific associations are the Royal Geographical Society of New South Wales, the Australian Anthropological Institute, and the Australasian Association for the Advancement of Science. The manufactures of the city comprise cars and locomotives, machinery, foundry- and smelting-products, stoves, textiles, boots and shoes, clothing, tobacco, malted and distilled liquors, etc. It is the outlet for a vast interior mining and pastoral region, and its exports of wool, leather, and gold are of great importance. Mean annual temperature, about 62°, which is about the same as that of Lisbon. Mean temperature of January, 71°; of July, 52°. Pop. in 1871, 134,747; in 1891, with the suburbs, 383,386; in 1901, 488,382, of whom 111,801 belonged to Sydney proper and the remainder to the numerous suburbs (Balmain, North Sydney, Paddington, Redfern, Glebe, Woollahra, etc.).

Sydney, or South Sydney, a town and port of entry of Nova Scotia, formerly capital of Cape Breton province, situated in the E. part of the island of Cape Breton, at the head of one of the finest harbors in the Atlantic, having a safe and secure entrance, 200 miles NE. of Halifax. Lat. about 46° 18′ N.; lon. 60° 15′ W. Sydney owes its prosperity to the yield of coal from the large deposits in the immediate vicinity, to steel-industries, packing, and ship-building. A railway connects the coal-mines with Sydney, and another extends to Louisburg. Sydney is the chief town of the co. of Cape Breton, and is resorted to as a naval station. It has a considerable trade with Newfoundland and the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. Pop. in 1901, 9909.

Syra, see'rȧ, officially called Syros (the ancient name), an island of the Grecian Archipelago, one of the Cyclades, 20 miles NW. of Paros. Area, about 30 sq. m. It is a rocky and mountainous island and very poor in natural products, but it contains the town of Hermoupolis, or Nea-Syros, one of the busiest of the Grecian seaports, built on the site of the ancient town of Syros. The bulk of the inhabitants reside in Hermoupolis. Near by is the old town of Ano-Syros (Ano-Syra). Pop. of the island in 1896, 26,856.

Syr'acuse (It. Siracusa, se-rȧ-koo'zȧ; L. Syracusæ; Gr. Συρακοῦσαι, Surakousai), a city of Italy, on the E. coast of the island of Sicily, capital of the province of Syracuse, 30 miles SSE. of Catania. It stands on the little island of Ortygia, about 1 mile long and ½ mile wide, connected by a mole with the main-land. It covers but a small fraction of the site occupied by ancient Syracuse when it had risen to be a great city. The proud metropolis of the western Hellenic world, which at the height of its prosperity contained a population of hundreds of thousands, consisted, in addition to Ortygia, of 4 quarters,—Achradina, Tyche, Neapolis, and Epipolæ. Its principal site was a rocky triangular plateau, descending precipitously to the sea, and tapering in width as it receded from the coast until it came to a point in the extreme W., where stood the great fort of Euryalus. The bay called Porto Grande, between Syracuse and the main-land to the W., shut in by Ortygia and the promontory of Plemmyrium (now Massolivieri), constitutes one of the finest harbors on the coast of Sicily, deep enough for the largest vessels. On the N. side of the island is the small shallow harbor called Porto Piccolo. In the S. the island terminates in a spit of land on which stands a mediæval castle. Syracuse is an unpretentious town, with narrow, crooked streets, which are lighted by electricity. It carries on an active trade in wine, oil, and fruits. It possesses a curious architectural monument in its cathedral, which was built about an ancient Doric temple, whose numerous lofty columns form part of the edifice. Among other objects of interest within the city are the building known as the temple of Diana, the famous fountain of Arethusa (whose waters were rendered salt by an earthquake), and some of the old palaces. There is a fine archæological museum, housed in a handsome new building.

On the main-land are to be seen various relics of the classical Syracuse, scanty memorials of the greatness of the city. They include remains of walls and aqueducts, of the fort of Euryalus, of a vast Greek theatre, hewn out of the rock, and of a Roman amphitheatre, the ruins of a huge structure supposed to have been the great altar of Hiero II. and of a Roman building known as the house of Agathocles, and the latomiæ, immense quarries, which appear to have served as prisons and as burial-places, now covered with luxuriant vegetation. Connected with one of these quarries is an artificial grotto, known as the Ear of Dionysius, which exhibits remarkable acoustic phenomena. Striking mementos of the earliest Christian times are the catacombs. Among the remains of mediæval Syracuse on the main-land is the church of San Giovanni.

Syracuse was founded by the Corinthians in the latter part of the eighth century B.C. Its rise was rapid. It rose to be the dominant power in Sicily, establishing its supremacy among the Greek cities of the island, and bidding defiance to the Carthaginians, who sought to bring Sicily under their sway. The Athenians undertook a disastrous expedition against it in 415–413 B.C. It was at the zenith of its greatness at the beginning of the fourth century B.C. under Dionysius the Elder. The Romans made themselves masters of the city in 212 B.C. Under the Romans it declined rapidly. Syracuse was a great centre of Greek culture. The most famous name connected with it is that of Archimedes, who was killed in the taking of the city by the Romans.

Syracuse, a banking post-village of Otoe co., Neb., on the Little Nemaha River and on the Burlington Route, 23 miles W. by S. of Nebraska City. Pop. in 1900, 861.

Syracuse, a city and port of delivery, capital of Onondaga co., N.Y., is situated on the New York Central and Hudson River, the West Shore and the Lackawanna Rs., 148 miles W. by N. of Albany. It is at the southern end of Onondaga Lake, which is circled by a broad boulevard, and presents a pleasing aspect in its well-shaded streets. The Erie Canal traverses the centre of the city. Among the more noteworthy buildings and institutions of a public character are the Federal building, town-hall, courthouse, St. Paul's and St. John's cathedrals, Museum of Fine Arts (opened in 1897), state hospital for feeble-minded children, county orphan asylum, Holden Observatory, and the various halls and college buildings of the Syracuse University (Crouse Memorial Hall, Hall of Languages, library, etc.). The university, with faculties or colleges of liberal arts, fine arts, medicine, law, and applied science, has an attendance of about 2200 students. As an industrial centre Syracuse holds the fourth place among the cities of the state. One of its leading industries is the manufacture of salt from deposits which were discovered as early as 1654 on the shores of Onondaga Lake by Jesuit missionaries from France, and which have been chiefly worked until the present time by the state, to which they yield a considerable revenue. An allied industry, the manufacture of soda-ash and kindred products, gives employment to about 3000 hands. Other leading manufactures carried on here are those of type-writers, iron and steel, tubing, foundry- and machine-shop products, automobiles, wagons, electrical apparatus and hardware specialties, mowers and reapers, ploughs, steam-heating apparatus, novelties of many kinds, knitted goods, malted liquors, etc. The city's water-supply is obtained from Lake Skaneateles. In 1789 Asa Danforth established salt-works here, and a settlement grew up, which was originally called Bogardus Corners and which changed its name several times. In 1825 the village was incorporated under the name of Syracuse. In 1847 the adjoining village of Salina was merged in Syracuse and the city was incorporated. Further annexations (Geddes, Onondaga) have been made since. Pop. in 1860, 28,119; in 1870, 43,051; in 1880, 51,792; in 1890, 88,143; in 1900, 108,374.

Syracuse, a post-village of Meigs co., Ohio, on the Ohio River, 5 miles above Pomeroy and 60 miles below Parkersburg. It has coaling- and salt-industries. Pop. about 1250.

Syracuse, a post-village of Davis co., Utah, on the Oregon Short Line. The banking point is Ogden. Pop. 200.

Syr-Darya, sir dar'yȧ, or Sihon, see'hon' (anc. Jaxartes, jax-ar'tēz), a large river of Asiatic Russia, rises, as the Naryn, on the W. slopes of the Tian-Shan, in Semiryetchensk, flows westward through Ferghana, and then NW. through the territory of Syr-Darya to the Sea of Aral, which it enters through a principal arm in about lat. 46° N. The major portion of its non-mountainous course is sluggish, and the depth of water is not sufficient to secure important navigation. A former arm of the river, now generally a dry bed, entered the Sea of Aral at its south-eastern point.

Syr-Darya, a territory or province of Asiatic Russia, in Turkestan, including most of the valley of the Syr-Darya, and bordering on the Sea of Aral. Area, 194,853 sq. m. Capital, Tashkent, in the extreme SE. part. Pop. in 1897, 1,479,848.

Syria, sir'e-a (Arab. Es-Sham), a country in the SW. part of Asia, forming part of the Turkish Empire. It extends eastward from the Mediterranean Sea to the river Euphrates and the Syrian Desert (the prolongation northward of the Arabian Desert), and southward from the Alma-Dagh (ancient Amanus), one of the ranges of the Taurus, to the frontiers of Egypt (Isthmus of Suez). It lies between the parallels of 31° and 37° N. lat. It comprises the vilayet of Syria (Suria), or of Damascus, the vilayet of Beirut, the SW. part of the vilayet of Aleppo, and the mutessarifliks of Jerusalem and the Lebanon. Palestine is included in Syria, comprising the mutessarriflik of Jerusalem and part of the vilayets of Beirut and Syria. The designation Syria is sometimes used in a wider sense so as to include the whole of the vilayet of Aleppo and the vilayet of Zor, a large part of Mesopotamia being thus added. Syria, in the ordinary acceptation of the name, has an area in round numbers of about 75,000 sq. m.

The country embraces nearly the entire E. coast of the great eastern arm of the Mediterranean Sea. Syria, on the whole, is a region of great elevation, the highland belts (mountains and plateaus) extending in a N. and S. direction. Close to the Mediterranean shore, along its middle reaches, stretch the twin lofty ranges of the Lebanon and Anti-Libanus, with the narrow valley of Cœle-Syria (El-Buka'a) between them. The Lebanon rises to a height of a little more than 10,000 feet, and the loftiest peak of the Anti-Libanus has an elevation exceeding 9000 ft. South of the ranges of the Lebanon are the highlands of Palestine, attaining an elevation of about 4000 ft., and the coast northward is skirted by mountains. Through Palestine, in an N. and S. direction, extends a remarkable depression or trough, through which the river Jordan descends, its waters accumulating in the Dead Sea, whose surface, about 1300 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean, is the most depressed portion of the earth's surface. The great plateau which stretches eastward from the mountain-ranges dips down gradually towards the desert. Above it, about 50 miles to the SE. of the S. extremity of the Anti-Libanus, rises the detached mountain-mass of Jebel-Hauran, whose loftiest summit has an elevation of about 6000 ft. The peaks of the Lebanon are of limestone formation, which gives to them their dazzling white appearance. Volcanic formations are present over large areas in Syria. To the E. of the upper Jordan is a vast stretch of lava-beds, and Jebel-Hauran bears numerous basaltic cones. The history of Syria records many destructive earthquakes.

A large proportion of the rivers of Syria lose themselves in the sands of the desert. The only river of any size in addition to the Jordan is the Nahr-el-Asi (anc. Orontes), which flows N. through Cœle-Syria and beyond, and bending abruptly westward enters the Mediterranean not far from Antakieh (Antioch). The Litany (anc. Leontes) flows southward through Cœle-Syria and empties near Tyre. The largest sheet of water in Syria is the Dead Sea. In its upper course the Jordan expands into lakes Huleh and Tabariyeh (Tiberias, Gennesaret, Galilee). There are a few lakes in northern Syria in the vicinity of Antioch, Aleppo, and Homs.

There are many fruitful valleys in the Lebanon, while the acclivities themselves have in many places been terraced and brought into a high state of cultivation. The valley of El-Buka'a is a very fertile tract, and the disintegrated volcanic material of the Hauran, on the W. side of Jebel-Hauran, constitutes a rich grain-growing soil. Much of the soil of Palestine is naturally productive, artificial irrigation, however, being largely necessary. The broad, low-lying plain of Esdraelon presents in the growing season a charming expanse of verdure. The surroundings of Damascus, rendered fruitful by the waters drawn from the river Barada, are one vast garden. The city of Aleppo is situated in the midst of a fertile plain. The Syrian plateaus present largely a barren aspect, and much of the country belongs to the desert. The chief feature of the climate of Syria is the long, hot, and rainless summer. Nearly the whole of the rainfall is in the six months from November to April. At Beirut, on the coast, the annual precipitation is as high as 36 inches; in Jerusalem it is about 22 inches. The regions to the E. of the mountains receive but little rain. Throughout most of the country recourse is had to artificial irrigation. The plant-life of the Syrian coast-land belongs to the realm of the Mediterranean flora, among the characteristic forms being the olive, oleander, mulberry, sycamore, date-palm, and pistachio. The forest-growth on the W. slopes of the Lebanon includes dwarf oaks, pines, and cypresses. Little remains of the cedars of Lebanon. Sub-tropical fruits of every kind are cultivated and fine wine is produced. The vegetation of the desert-region is characterized by the presence of aromatic and thorny plants. The fertile tracts of Syria produce large crops of cereals. Among other products, in addition to fruits, are pulse, cotton, tobacco, indigo, and rice. The rearing of the silk-worm is extensively carried on. The most prominent of the domestic animals are sheep (including many flat-tailed ones) and goats. The camel is used extensively in the parts bordering on the desert. Among wild beasts of prey is the panther. Jackals are numerous. There are venomous serpents of various species, as well as scorpions, and swarms of locusts often descend upon the crops.

The manufacturing industries of Syria are but little developed, the bulk of the people being engaged in rural pursuits, trade, and transportation. In the large towns, however, there are many handicrafts-men, whose skill is displayed in the quality of the silk stuffs, metallic wares, leather goods, gold and silver thread, and other articles which they produce. Among the leading exports are grain, silk, sesame, olives and olive-oil, wool, and sponges. The principal seaport of Syria is Beirut, the port of Damascus, with which it is connected by rail. Southern Syria is traversed from N. to S. by the railway line which is in course of construction from Damascus to Mecca. Jerusalem is connected by rail with Jaffa, its port, and there is a railway line extending from the seaport of Haifa to the Jordan valley. The largest cities of Syria are Damascus, Aleppo, and Beirut.

The inhabitants of Syria number about 2,500,000. They consist of descendants of the ancient Syrians (Aramæans), whose speech is Arabic; Arabs, sedentary and nomadic; Turks, Jews, Franks, Greeks, and Armenians. The great bulk of the people are Mohammedans. The Christians belong to a great variety of sects. The schismatic Mohammedan sect of the Druses, who dwell in the Lebanon, have distinguished themselves by their fierce hatred of their Christian neighbors, the Maronites. The Syriac tongue is now practically a dead language.

History.—At the close of the second millenium B.C., the Phœnicians, who dwelt in the narrow coast-land of Syria, were at the height of their power and prosperity, Tyre and Sidon being their leading city-states. About this time the Hebrew kingdom makes its appearance in history, established in the regions conquered from the Canaanites. On the southern part of the coast-land were the cities of the Philistines. From about the middle of the tenth century B.C. there were two Hebrew kingdoms, Israel and Judah. In the ninth century B.C. the Aramæan kingdom of Damascus was at the height of its power. The Assyrian kings pushed their conquests into Syria. The Phœnician cities were forced to pay them tribute; the Philistines were made subject; the kingdoms of Damascus and Israel were extinguished by them. The country was known to the Greeks as Assyria, the name being contracted to Syria. From the dominion of Assyria Syria passed under that of Babylonia. The kingdom of Judah was destroyed by the Babylonians about 586 B.C. In the second half of the sixth century B.C. the sway of Babylonia was succeeded by that of Persia. Two centuries later Syria became part of the Asiatic empire of Alexander of Macedon. The most extensive of the kingdoms which arose as fragments of the great Macedonian realm, that of the Seleucidæ, bore the name of kingdom of Syria, although Syria constituted but a small part of its vast area. Antioch, the capital of the Seleucid monarchs, rose to be a splendid city and a great centre of Greek culture. In 190 B.C. the Romans wrested the greater part of Asia Minor from the Syrian monarchy. Before the middle of that century the Jews threw off the Syrian yoke. In 64 B.C. Syria became a Roman possession, and in the following year Judea was made tributary to Rome. In the third century A.D. Palmyra was the capital of a splendid realm. On the division of the Roman Empire in the fourth century Syria became part of the Byzantine Empire. In the first half of the seventh century it was conquered by the Saracens (Arabs). Damascus was the capital of the Ommiad caliphs. In the latter part of the eleventh century the country fell into the hands of the Seljuks. It was in order to wrest the Holy Land from these Turkish invaders that the Crusades were set on foot. The Christian kingdom of Jerusalem was founded in 1099. The Crusaders took the cities along the coast, and Antioch was the seat of a Christian principality. In the latter part of the twelfth century Saladin, Sultan of Egypt, conquered Syria and extinguished the kingdom of Jerusalem. Since 1516 Syria has formed part of the empire of the Ottoman Turks.

Tabariyeh, tå‘bå-ree′yeh, or Tabaria (anc. Tiberias), a town of Palestine, 27 miles ESE. of Acre, on the W. shore of the Lake of Tiberias. It is enclosed landward by a strong wall of modern construction flanked by towers. Tiberias was founded by Herod Antipas in the early part of the first century A.D., and named in honor of the Roman emperor Tiberius. As the new capital of Galilee it rose to great splendor. In later Roman times it became a great centre of Hebrew learning, a position which it long maintained under Byzantine rule. Here in 1187 Saladin won a victory over the Christians which brought Jerusalem into his power. The place, after having sunk into utter insignificance, has revived in recent years and now contains several thousand inhabitants, mainly Jews, who have a number of synagogues. Near by are frequented hot springs.

Tabariyeh, Bahr, or Lake (Lake of Gennesaret, Sea of Galilee, Sea of Tiberias), a lake of Palestine, traversed by the Jordan in its upper course. Length, 14 miles; greatest breadth, 8 miles. Its surface is 680 feet below that of the Mediterranean Sea. Around it were anciently the cities of Tiberias (from which the modern name of the lake is derived), Magdala, Capernaum, Chorazin, and Bethsaida, all of which, except Tiberias, have disappeared.

Tabasco, a state of Mexico, bounded on the N. by the Gulf of Mexico, E. by Campeche and Guatemala, S. by Chiapas, and W. by Vera Cruz. Area, 10,072 sq. m. The surface consists almost entirely of a great flat, sloping gradually to the sea, but in many parts so low as to be subject to inundations, which often isolate its villages and leave no means of communication except by canoes. Only along the southern border is there a line of mountain elevations. The streams, though numerous, are short and shallow, and generally obstructed at their mouths by bars and flats. The more important are the Usumacinta and Tabasco (lower course of the Grijalva), which converge and have a common outlet; the Chiltepec, Chilapilla, Gonzales, Blanquilla, and Tanciochapa, the last-named forming part of the boundary between Tabasco and Vera Cruz. The climate is excessively hot and unhealthy. A large portion of the state is still covered with forest. The soil is very fertile and produces maize, excellent sugar-cane, coffee, cacao, vanilla, rice, and various tropical fruits. The inhabitants are chiefly Indians. Principal towns, San Juan Bautista (the capital) and Frontera. Pop. in 1900, 159,834.

Tabriz, tȧ'brēz', Tebriz, or Tauris (anc. Gazaca), a city of Persia, next to Teheran the largest in the country, capital of the province of Azerbaijan, about 30 miles E. of Lake Urumiah, in lat. 38° 2′ N. and lon. 46° 12′ E. It is situated at an elevation of about 4500 feet above the sea, at the foot of Mount Sahand, which rises about 4000 ft. above the city. Pop. estimated at about 175,000. The city was formerly much more populous than at present, and it is full of ruins, attesting the violence of the earthquakes which have visited it, as well as its great decline. The inner portions, in spite of the numerous baths, bustling and well-stocked bazaars and many mosques, present little that is attractive, the only striking architectural object being the beautiful Blue Mosque. The outlying quarters, however, present a charming expanse of gardens and orchards. Tabriz was formerly a flourishing entrepôt of the trade between Persia, India, and the Russian and Turkish dominions. Since the Caspian Sea became a great highway of commerce the place has in great measure lost its importance, although the volume of business is still large. Among the leading articles of export are carpets and rugs, shawls, raisins, and almonds. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in the textile industry.

Elevation of the surface, as determined by Lemaire, about 2550 feet

(2756 ft. according to Stanley). Greatest depth, about 2125 ft. Lake Tanganyika occupies a narrow trough in the Great Rift Valley of Africa, with the shore-line in places clearly defined by abrupt cliff escarpments. It receives the Rusisi, the overflow from Lake Kivu, in the N., and discharges through the Lukuga, on the W., into the Lualaba, or main water of the upper Congo. The surface undergoes marked fluctuations of level. The waters are fresh and yet contain certain marine faunal types, which has given origin to the view that the lake may be the relict of a vast interior water (Congo Sea), which was formerly a direct continuation of the Atlantic Ocean. Lake Tanganyika was discovered by Burton and Speke in 1858, and was subsequently explored by Livingstone, Stanley, and other travellers. The chief settlements on its shores are Usumbura (in the N.), Ujiji (E.), Bismarckburg (S.), and Albertville (W.). It is navigated by steamboats.

Tangier, tăn-jeer′, called Tanja by the natives (anc. Tingis), the most important seaport and the diplomatic capital of Morocco, near the W. entrance of the Strait of Gibraltar, a few miles E. of Cape Spartel and about 36 miles SW. of Gibraltar. Lat. 35° 47′ N.; lon. 5° 48′ W. It stands on a height near a spacious bay and, rising in the form of an amphitheatre, presents a very striking appearance when approached from the sea. It is surrounded by walls, with gateways, and has a crumbling castle or citadel (kasba) crowning one of the dominating heights. Tangier is a city of peculiar aspect, consisting mainly of houses of one story, built along lanes or narrow streets, too steep to permit of the use of vehicles. Almost the only exceptions to the general primitiveness of the buildings are furnished by the residences of the European consuls and ministers and those of a few wealthy merchants, and the modern hotels that have recently been constructed. There are several mosques and Jewish synagogues and a Roman Catholic church and convent. Near the centre of the city, which is illumined with the electric light, is the Little Sok (Sokko) or market, and outside of the walls the Large Sok, where caravans frequently arrive with merchandise from the Saharan oases and the Sudan. The harbor, which was formerly very much frequented by vessels from almost all maritime countries, is now neglected. Most of the commerce, which is very limited, is confined to Gibraltar and the Spanish coast; the internal traffic is chiefly with Tetuan and Fez. The trade is mainly in hides, wax, wool, grain, leeches, fruit (especially the date), cattle, poultry, etc.; woollens, brass trays, and matting are manufactured, and much of the famous Morocco leather. Tangier is also an emporium for the sale of Rabat and other Moroccan carpets and the real "fezes" obtained from Fez. Tangier (Tingis) was under the Romans the capital of Mauretania Tingitana. It was taken by the Portuguese in 1471 and transferred in 1662 to England as part of the dowry of Catharine of Braganza. The British kept possession of it for 22 years. Pop. estimated at about 30,000, of whom it is thought the Christians number 6000 and the Jews 5000.

Tarragona, tar-rä-go'nä (anc. Tar'raco), a city of Spain, in Catalonia, capital of the province of Tarragona, situated at the mouth of the Francolí, in the Mediterranean Sea, 52 miles WSW. of Barcelona. The old town, narrow and cramped, and rich in Roman remains, lies on the slope of a steep eminence crowned by the mediæval cathedral and the archiepiscopal palace. On three sides the city is still enclosed by gigantic ("cyclopean") walls. The ancient remains include, besides countless Roman inscriptions, the ruins of a circus, an aqueduct, and the Torreón de Pilatos, a prison, supposedly dating from the time of Augustus. On the remains of some of the old walls runs the Paseo de Santa Clara, a promenade commanding beautiful views of sea and land. The cathedral, dating from the end of the twelfth century, is an exquisite product of the late Romanesque-Transition style. It has a handsome W. façade, an imposing interior, and cloisters which are among the most beautiful in Spain. Other noteworthy features of the town are the archiepiscopal palace, the Casa Provincial de Beneficencia, with an attractive garden, and the Casa Consistorial, containing the Provincial Museum of Archæology. The city has an art academy, several seminaries, a library, and a school of architecture. The industries of Tarragona include the manufacture of silk, paper, and alcohol, and the salting of fish. There is considerable trade in wine. Tarragona has a good and sheltered harbor. It is the seat of an archbishop. Under the Romans the town gave its name to one of the three provinces into which the Iberian Peninsula was divided,—Hispania Tarraconensis. Pop. in 1900, 26,281.

Tarsus (Turk. Tersus, tĕr'sŏŏs), a town in the SE. corner of Asia Minor, about 20 miles WSW. of Adana, and at nearly an equal distance NE. of the seaport of Mersina, on the little river Cydnus, 12 miles from its mouth in the Mediterranean. The railway connecting Adana with Mersina passes the town. It is a very unpretentious-looking place, with nothing to remind one of the celebrated Tarsus of antiquity. Its population is probably not far from 15,000 and is a strange medley of peoples from different parts of the East. Among the industries is cotton-cleaning. The town is surrounded by delightful orchards and gardens. Tarsus was the chief city of ancient Cilicia. It flourished under the Romans and was famous for its learning. It is noted as the birthplace of the apostle Paul. It was still an important place in the Middle Ages. Many relics of ancient Tarsus have been brought to light in and about the town.

Tartary, a name which formerly, in the widest acceptation of the designation, was applied to the middle portion of the Eurasiatic continent, extending from the shores of the Pacific Ocean to the river Dnieper, and thus comprising Manchuria, Mongolia, Dzungaria, Turkestan, part of Siberia, and a considerable portion of Russia. Later, when the application of the name had become greatly restricted, the designations Little Tartary (European Tartary) and Great Tartary (Asiatic Tartary) came into use. European Tartary, when it had been reduced to the dominions over which the khans of the Crimea held sway (the Crimea and an extensive region about the rivers Dnieper and Don) came to be known as Crim Tartary. The name Tartary, as designating a region of Asia, became finally a designation for the khanates of Turkestan taken collectively, the name Independent Tartary being used as synonymous with Turkestan. The use of the name Tartary is now antiquated.

Tasman (or Great Tasman) Glacier, the largest of the Southern Alps of New Zealand, is fed by the snows of Mount Hochstetter. It gives origin to the Tasman River.

Tasmania, taz-mā'ne-ą, formerly Van Diemen's (dee'mĕnz) Land, an island and British colony of the South Pacific Ocean, off the southernmost point of Australia, from which it is separated by Bass Strait, about 150 miles wide. It is comprised between lat. 40° 40′ and 43° 38′ S. and lon. 144° 40′ and 148° 20′ E. Area, 26,215 sq. m. The major part of Tasmania consists of a central plateau or highland, having a general elevation of 3000 feet or more, and bearing on its summit a number of exceedingly picturesque lakes (Great Lake, 12 miles long, 3800 ft. above the sea). Rising above this plateau of ancient construction, and continuing almost to the W. coast, are several short mountain-ridges or isolated summits, in part of igneous origin, which give the surface a broken aspect. The highest of these elevations is Mount Cradle, 5070 ft., which is the culminating point of the island. A scarcely less lofty range or series of heights follows the direction of the E. coast, and of this system Ben Lomond, about 5000 ft. in height, is the loftiest summit. Other prominent summits in the island are Frenchman's Cap, 4756 ft.; Mount Barrow, 4644 ft.; Ironstone Mountain, 4736 ft.; Mount Field West, 4721 ft.; Mount Hügel, 4700 ft.; Mount William, 4360 ft.; Mount Olympus; Mount Victoria, 3964 ft.; and Mount Wellington, overlooking Hobart, 4166 ft. The chief rivers are, in the S., the Derwent (about 130 miles long) and its branches and the Huon (about 100 miles in length), and, in the N., the Tamar, properly an estuary, formed by the union of the Macquarie and the (South) Esk. A number of minor streams (Arthur, Pieman, Gordon) discharge on the W. coast. The chief harbors or larger inlets of the coast are Storm Bay, leading to Hobart; D'Entrecasteaux Channel, leading to the estuary of the Huon; Port Davey and Bathurst Harbor in the SW.; Macquarie Harbor in the W.; Port Dalrymple and Ringarooma Bay, in the N.; and Oyster Bay, in the E.

The island was at one time almost entirely covered with forests and much woodland still remains. The vegetation is essentially of the Australian type, with a marked development of the eucalyptus or blue gum, some of whose individuals are said to attain the prodigious height of 350 feet and more. The valuable Huon pine is still abundant in the S. The principal agricultural crops are oats (yield of 1,600,000 bushels in 1904), wheat, potatoes, and hay. Hops are extensively grown, while fruit culture has developed into an important industry. The native Tasmanian fauna, like the flora, is of the Australian type, with the marsupials and monotremes as the distinctive mammalian forms. Two carnivorous marsupials, the so-called Tasmanian tiger or wolf, exhibiting a remarkable case of convergent modification, and the Tasmanian devil, are peculiar to the island, as well as a number of birds. Tasmania shares with Australia in the possession of the duck-bill (or ornithorhynchus). The mineral wealth of the island comprises deposits of gold (reef and placer), tin (mined in the Mount Bischoff region in the NW. and at Branxholme in the NE.), silver (Zeehan, Dundas), copper (Mount Lyell), lead, antimony, nickel (Dundas, Heazlewood), and coal (Fingal, Mount Nicolas, etc.; output in 1903, 51,805 tons). The copper and silver output in 1903 was valued at about $4,300,000.

The climate is salubrious and delightful, the mildest and most equable in all Australasia, and very much like that of the south of England. The mean winter temperature of the coast is 47°–48°, and the summer mean 62°. A maximum temperature of 110°–115° has been registered at Hobart. At Port Arthur, in Tasman's Peninsula, lat. 43° 10′ S., the mean temperature of the year is 58°; of the coldest month, 53°, of the warmest, 62°; mean annual temperature of the whole island, about 53°. The average annual rainfall in the island is about 21 inches. The live-stock numbered as follows in 1903: horses, 35,341; cattle, 185,938; pigs, 56,538; and sheep and lambs, 1,397,053. The wool-clip in 1903 was estimated at 9,200,000 pounds. The whaling-trade is a branch of industry which at one time yielded to the colony a large revenue. The length of railway operated in 1903 was 620 miles, with a main line connecting Hobart with Launceston. In common with the adjacent colonies, Tasmania enjoys self-government. The governor is appointed by the crown. The legislature consists of two houses, the Legislative Council and the House of Assembly, the members of the former serving for 6 years and those of the latter for 3 years. The island was discovered by Tasman in 1642 and named Van Diemen's Land in honor of the Dutch governor of the East Indies. It was afterwards partly explored by Cook in 1769. The first penal settlement formed there was in 1804, but in 1853, penal transportation having been abolished, the name of the colony was changed to Tasmania. On Jan. 1, 1901, Tasmania became one of the states of the commonwealth of Australia. Pop. in 1901, 172,475. Capital, Hobart. The aboriginal inhabitants of the island, the Tasmanians of ethnologists, are entirely extinct.

Tasman Peninsula, in Tasmania, co. of Pembroke, is connected N. with Forestier's Peninsula. The penal settlement of Port Arthur is located here. On its N. and W. sides are Norfolk and Storm bays. Capes Raoul and Pillar form its SW. and SE. extremities.

Tauromenium, the ancient name of Taormina.

Taurus, a mountain-chain of Asiatic Turkey, forming the great southern buttress to the Anatolian plateau and extending, with minor breaks, from near the Euphrates on the E. in a WSW. and W. direction to the extremity of the Anatolian Peninsula. For the greater part of this distance it follows closely the Mediterranean border, falling steeply to the S. and in more gentle contours to the N. The islands of Rhodes, Scarpanto, and Crete appear to be an orographic continuation of these mountains. Different sections of this lofty range have received different names, as the Ala-Dagh, Bulgar- (Bolgor-) Dagh, and the Anti-Taurus, the last-named properly a diverging stem, beginning with the river or gorge of the Sihun and having associated with it the volcanic Arjish-Dagh (Mount Argæus), the loftiest mountain in Asia Minor, 13,300 feet high. Northward of the Bay of Iskanderun, the Jihun gorge separates the Taurian mountains from the mountains of Syria, which appear to coalesce northeastward towards the Euphrates. The Armenian mountains lying E. of the Euphrates seem also to be orographically related to the mountains on the W. The loftiest summits of the central Taurus are seemingly the Aidost (Suess-Spitze), NNW. of Mersina, 11,680 ft., and the Metdesis (Methesis), lying a little to the eastward (in the Bulgar-Dagh), 11,700 ft. The snow-line is found on the N. side at about 9500 ft., and on the S. at 10,500 ft. The final uplift of the Taurus Mountains was effected in the Tertiary period of geological time.

Teheran, tĕh'hẹr-ân', or Tehran, tĕh-rân', the capital of Persia, 70 miles S. of the Caspian Sea and 210 miles N. of Ispahan. Lat. 35° 42′ N.; lon. 51° 25′ E. It is situated on a plateau nearly 4000 feet above the level of the sea, near the foot of one of the highest peaks of the snow-clad Elburz Mountains. The plain around the city has been converted through artificial irrigation into a smiling garden. Teheran is surrounded by a wall of modern construction and a moat, and is entered by about a dozen gates. The city presents the appearance of a great, ill-built oriental town passing through the process of modernization. It exhibits an endless array of low dwellings built of mud, numerous houses of the wealthier classes, whose plain exteriors give no indication of the luxury that reigns within, mosques, bazaars, caravansaries, and narrow, unpaved streets, and by the side of this modern boulevards illuminated with gas and traversed by tramways. Many of the better houses have courts, within which are beautiful gardens and basins fed by pure water brought from a distance. The interior apartments are often handsomely decorated. The principal object of interest in the city is the royal palace, with its gardens, kiosks, baths, splendid apartments, its marble throne, and its museum containing jewels and gems of priceless value. Among the institutions that reflect the transformation which the Persian capital is undergoing is King's College, a polytechnic institute in which a number of European professors are employed. The sanitary condition of Teheran has of late been greatly improved, but in the summer a residence in the city is almost unendurable, and there is a great exodus of the well-to-do inhabitants to the inviting environs, in which are a number of fine royal chateaux and hunting-seats.

Teheran is not very important as an industrial city. It is the centre of a considerable caravan trade and is connected with Resht by a modern highway. Near the city are the ruins of the ancient Rhages (Rei), the birthplace of Harun al-Rashid. About 40 miles NE. of Teheran is the volcanic peak of Demavend, towering to a height of about 18,000 feet. The city rose to importance only about 100 years ago, after the establishment of the Kajar dynasty in Persia. The population in winter is estimated at about 250,000, but in the summer the number of inhabitants is supposed to be diminished by about one-third. There are only a few hundred Europeans.

Templeton, a post-village in Templeton township (town), Worcester co., Mass., on the Boston and Albany R., 10 miles S. of Winchenden. It has manufactures of furniture, tin-ware, etc. Pop. of the town in 1900, 3489.

Templeton, a post-village of Armstrong co., Pa., on the Alleghany River and on the Pennsylvania R., 9 miles N. of Kittanning. Pop. 175.

Templeton, a post-hamlet of Prince George co., Va., about 14 miles S. by E. of Petersburg.

Templeton, a post-village of Waukesha co., Wis., on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul and the Wisconsin Central Rs. The banking point is Waukesha.

Templeuve, tŏn'pluv', a village of Belgium, in Hainaut, on the French frontier, 5 miles NW. of Tournai.

Templeville, a post-village of Queen Anne co., Md., about 50 miles ESE. of Baltimore. Pop. 100.

Templin, tĕm-pleen', a town of Prussia, in Brandenburg, on Lake Templin, 24 miles SE. of Neustrelitz. It has retained its old walls, made of rough stones. Pop. in 1900, 4694.

Templin, a post-hamlet of Wabaunsee co., Kan., 18 miles from Council Grove.

Tempo, a village of Ireland, co. of Fermanagh, on the Tempo, 8 miles ENE. of Enniskillen.

Temryuk, tĕm-re-ook', a seaport in the Russian territory of the Kuban, Ciscaucasia, on the S. side of the Sea of Azov, about 30 miles E. of the Strait of Yenikale. Pop. in 1897, 14,476.

Temuco, tä-moo'ko, a town in the S. part of Chile, capital of Cautín province, on the Cautín River, 80 miles (direct) NNE. of Valdivia, with which it is connected by rail. Pop. in 1902, 9699.

Temuka, a post-town of South Island, New Zealand, 88 miles from Christchurch. Pop. 2000.

Tenafly, ten'ăf-lī, a post-borough of Bergen co., N.J., on the Erie R., 16 miles N. of Jersey City and about 1 mile W. of the Hudson River. Pop. in 1900, 1746. The banking point is Englewood.

Tenaha, a post-village of Shelby co., Tex., 39 miles from Nacogdoches, on the Houston East and West Texas R. Pop. about 800. The banking point is Timpson.

Tenakee, a village of Alaska, on Chichagof Island.

Tenancingo, tä-nän-sing'go, a town of Mexico, state and 50 miles SW. of the city of Mexico. Pop. in 1900, 9891.

Tenango del Valle, tä-nång'go dĕl vål'yå, a town of Mexico, in the state of Mexico, 15 miles SE. of Toluca. Pop. in 1900, 5881.

Tenants Harbor, a post-village of Knox co., Me., on a small inlet of the ocean, 12 miles SSW. of Rockland. It has a fine harbor and granite-works. Pop. about 750.

Tenasserim, tĕn-as'sęh-rim, a river of Tenasserim, which flows S. through a narrow valley, but near the town of Tenasserim turns sharply W., and enters the Bay of Bengal a short distance N. of the parallel of 12° N. lat. At its mouth it forms a delta, on one of the islands of which stands the town of Mergui. Total course, upward of 200 miles.

Tenasserim, a division or commissionership of Lower Burma, comprising the SE. part of the country. It is mainly a long, narrow strip, having Siam on the E. and the Bay of Bengal on the W., reaching southward to the isthmus of Kra, which connects the Malay Peninsula with Indo-China (about lat. 10° N.). The northern portion is bounded on the W. by Pegu. Area, about 45,000 sq. m. The surface is mostly mountainous and covered with fine forests teeming with large game, but there are some alluvial plains well adapted to cultivation. The principal river is the Salwin, in the extreme N. The Mergui Archipelago is off the coast. Pop. in 1901, 1,137,776. Capital, Maulmain. Among other important or well-known towns are Tavoy, Mergui, and Amherst. Tenasserim passed into the hands of the British at the close of the first Burmese war, in 1826.

Tenasserim, a decayed town of Tenasserim, Lower Burma, on the Tenasserim River, about 40 miles SE. of Mergui.

Tenay, tęh-nä', a town of France, in Ain, 30 miles from Bourg. Pop. about 3500.

Tenbury, tĕn'bęr-e, a town of England, co. and 18 miles WNW. of Worcester, on the S. bank of the Teme. Pop. about 2000.

Tenby (Welsh, Denbych y Pysgod, den'biĸ e pis'god), a municipal borough and seaport of Wales, co. and 9 miles E. of Pembroke, on the W. side of Carmarthen Bay. It is picturesquely situated on a long, rocky promontory, and with the well-preserved remains of its old gates and walls presents a striking appearance. Above the town rise the ruins of Tenby Castle and a monument to Prince Albert. The church of St. Mary has a lofty spire and contains some interesting tombs and monuments. There is a geological museum. The equable climate and fine situation of Tenby make it a popular watering-place. Fisheries are carried on. Pop. in 1901, 4400.

Tencha Bayou, ten'chå bī'oo, Shelby co., Tex., runs nearly eastward and enters the Sabine River.

Tenda, tĕn'då, a small town of Italy, 3 miles S. of the Col di Tenda, a pass of the Maritime Alps, to which it gives name.

Tenda, Col di, Alps. See COL DI TENDA.

Tendre, Mont, Jura Mountains. See MONT-TENDRE.

Tenedos (Gr. Τένεδος), an island 5 miles off the NW. coast of Asia Minor, near the SW. entrance of the Dardanelles. Length, 5 miles; area, 16 sq. m. It produces much wine. Pop. about 4000. On it is the busy little seaport of Tenedos.

Tenejapa, tå-nå-hå'på, a town of Mexico, in Chiapas, 19 miles ENE. of San Cristóbal. Pop. in 1895, 7936.

Tenerife, tå-nå-ree'få, a town of Colombia, department of Cauca, on the Magdalena River, 50 miles NW. of Mompox.

Teneriffe, tĕn'ẽr-iff' (Sp. Tenerife, tå-nå-ree'få), the largest of the Canary Islands, between Gran Canaria on the E. and Gomera on the W. Lat. from 28° to 28° 35′ N., lon. from 16° 5′ to 16° 55′ W. It is 60 miles long from NE. to SW. Area, 785 sq. m. The island is wholly of volcanic formation, is composed principally of enormous masses of trachyte, basalt, and comparatively recent lava, and in its culminating point, the Peak of Teneriffe (Pico de Teide), attains an elevation of 12,200 feet. The coast presents an almost uninterrupted succession of lofty cliffs, pierced by narrow, precipitous fissures or ravines, and very few openings in which a vessel can find shelter. The only good harbor now existing is that of Santa Cruz (Santa Cruz de Tenerife), on the NE. The Peak of Teneriffe, which is the highest point rising out of the Atlantic basin, is geologically one of the most instructive of volcanic cones. Its lower slopes, supporting extensive growths of chestnut, peach, fig, banana, lemon, and orange, have numerous hamlets and villages scattered over them. A median zone is that of the oaks, pines, laurels, various heaths, and violets (the highest flowering plant), beyond which follows (above 10,000 ft.) the naked and craggy lava-desert or malpais, and then the fields of scoriæ and pumice. The view from the summit, which has a crater a few hundred ft. in diameter, and which carries a snow-cap ordinarily during the months from November to April, is one of the most magnificent in the world.

The principal products of Teneriffe are maize, wheat, potatoes, pulse, almonds, tropical fruits, honey, wax, silk, cochineal, sugar, and wine. The dragon-tree, cocoanut and date-palm, numerous cacti and euphorbias also flourish. The manufactures are very insignificant, but include, in addition to some coarse linen, woollen, and silk goods, some excellent specimens of furniture and cabinet-work. The Guanches, the original inhabitants of the island, almost all perished in vain endeavors to defend their freedom against the attacks of the Spaniards. The present inhabitants consist of a mixed race, in which Spanish features predominate. Pop. in 1900, 138,008. Capital, Santa Cruz de Tenerife. Other towns are Laguna, Orotava, on the NW. coast (noted for a famous dragon-tree), Guimar, and Puerto de la Cruz.

Ténès, or Tenez, tå'nez, a maritime town of Algeria, 103 miles WSW. of Algiers. Pop. in 1901, 2326. Near it is Cape Ténès, on the Mediterranean.

Ténès, Cape, on the N. coast of Algeria. Lat. 36° 34′ N.; lon. 1° 23′ E.

Te-ngan, tă'ngån', a city of China, in the northern part of the province of Hu-peh.

Teng-chow, or Tung-chow, a town of China, province of Shan-tung, on the coast, at the entrance of the Gulf of Pe-chi-li.

Tenghiz, a lake of Asia. See BALKASH.

Tengri-Nor, tĕn'gree' nor, a lake of Tibet, 80 miles NW. of Lhasa. It is about 50 miles long. Altitude, 15,190 feet.

Tengyueh, an open port of China, in the province of Yun-nan Tenimber (written also Tenember and Tanimba) Islands, a group of isles in the Malay Archipelago, of which the chief is Timor Laut. They extend from about lat. 6° 30′ to 8° 30′ S., lon. from 130° 40′ to 132° E., and are mostly coral islands surrounded by coral reefs.

Tenino, a post-village of Thurston co., Wash., on the Northern Pacific and the Port Townsend Southern Rs., 39 miles SSW. of Tacoma. Pop. 300.

Tenmile, a post-station of Campbell co., Ky.

Tenmile, a post-station of Douglas co., Oregon.

Tenmile, a post-village of Washington co., Pa., on Tenmile Creek, about 34 miles S. by W. of Pittsburg.

Tenmile, a post-village of Berkeley co., S.C. Pop. 75.

Tenmile, a post-village of Upshur co., W.Va., on the Baltimore and Ohio R. The banking point is Buckhannon.

Tenmile Bottom, a post-hamlet of Venango co., Pa., 5 miles SE. of Oil City.

Tenmile Creek, Greene co., Pa., flows into the Monongahela River.

Ten Mile Creek, or Tynemouth, a post-village of St. John co., New Brunswick, on the Bay of Fundy, 27 miles from St. John.

Ten Mile Peak, Colo., a mountain in lat. 39° 32′ N., lon. 106° 6′ W. Altitude, about 11,800 feet.

Tenmile Stand, a post-hamlet of Meigs co., Tenn., 14 miles WNW. of Sweetwater.

Tennallytown, a village of the District of Columbia, 6 miles NNW. of the centre of Washington, of which it is a post-substation.

Tennent, a post-village of Monmouth co., N.J., on the Pennsylvania R. The banking point is Freehold. Pop. 100.

Ten'nessee', a south-central state of the American Union, bounded N. by Kentucky and Virginia, E. by North Carolina, S. by Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, and W. by Arkansas and Missouri. The northern boundary eastward from the Tennessee River is approximately the parallel of 36° 38′ N. lat.; westward of that river it is the parallel of 36° 30′. The southern boundary is the parallel of 35°. Its W. boundary is formed by the Mississippi River. From North Carolina it is separated by the Iron, Bald, and Unaka or Great Smoky ridges of the Appalachian Mountains, whose general altitude is 5000 feet and whose broad tops are generally treeless. Area of the land-surface, 41,750 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 300 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—Tennessee is popularly spoken of as consisting of three sections,—East, Middle, and West Tennessee. The first consists of: The eastern mountain-border, with numerous lofty summits: Clingman's Peak (or Dome), 6619 feet; Mount Guyot, 6636 ft.; Mount Le Conte, 6612 ft.; Mount Love, 6443 ft.; High Knob, etc. (2) The beautiful East Tennessee Valley, which has an average elevation at the N. of 1350 ft. and at the S. of 800 ft., and is one of the most fertile and populous tracts in the state. This valley is closely furrowed with minor ridges, long valleys, and enclosed "coves," nearly all with a NE. and SW. trend, and the whole varying from about 30 to 55 miles in width. (3) The greater portion of the Cumberland Mountain plateau (elevation above the valley, 900 to 2000 ft. or more), which on its southeastern border breaks down at once in perpendicular or overhanging sandstone cliffs, often of great height, while its western edge is notched and jagged with deep coves and projecting spurs. In the N. it is 70 miles wide; at the S. extremity but 50 miles. Its top is generally level; but at some points there are superincumbent mountains; and the deep Sequatchie Valley, with its steep mountain-walls, reaches into the plateau in a northward course. The plateau has a delightful climate, abounds in deep caves, and conceals great mineral treasures. Middle Tennessee extends westward from the plateau region to the lower Tennessee River. It is a region of fertile terraces, traversed by many ravines and streams, and declining northwestward towards "the garden of Tennessee," a basin-like area of 5000 sq. m. West Tennessee lies W. of the Tennessee River and E. of the Mississippi. Its eastern slope is considerably broken; the western descent is a rolling plain, which ultimately terminates in steep bluffs overlooking the Mississippi bottom-lands. These are partially timbered and abound in lakes and swamps.

Rivers.—The Mississippi, Tennessee, and Cumberland afford extensive commercial facilities. The Tennessee, including its head-streams, crosses the state twice. Its principal tributaries are the Clinch, Holston (the confluence of these two generally considered to form the Tennessee), Hiawassee, Sequatchie, Elk, and Duck. The Little Tennessee and French Broad flow into the Holston. Among the tributaries of the Mississippi, direct and indirect, are the Big Hatchie, Wolf, Forked Deer, Obion, and Reelfoot. Reelfoot Lake, in the NW., is the largest lake in the state. It is a shallow expanse, formed during the earthquake of 1811. The principal affluents of the Tennessee have been made available for high-water navigation to some extent. The chief tributaries of the Cumberland are the Harpeth, Stone, and Obie's rivers, and the Caney Fork. Both the Tennessee and the Cumberland are badly obstructed by shoals at low water. The minor streams of the state afford very great water-power, though in the mountainous parts their very rapid fall and their large and frequent fluctuations in volume render them unreliable for practical purposes.

Geology, Mineral Wealth.—The eastern mountain-border consists mainly of Cambrian and Silurian rocks and of the underlying Azoic series. It affords asbestos, kaolin, and beautiful red, green, and other granites. Valuable copper-mines are wrought in Polk co., in the extreme SE., and elsewhere; and the foot-hills abound in iron-ore, including rich pyrites, limonite, hematite, magnetite, and valuable iron-manganese ores. The East Tennessee Valley, which is geographically and geologically a continuation of the Kittatinny Valley of New Jersey, the Cumberland Valley of Pennsylvania, and the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia, is floored with the Trenton limestone and Hudson River shales. The valley contains dyestone (a valuable fossiliferous brown hematite), hydraulic cement rock, good lithographic shale, heavy-spar, millstone, slate, an abundance of potter's clay, limestone, fire-proof stone, native blue vitriol, marble, and ores of lead and zinc. The coal-measures underlie an area of 5000 sq. m., mainly occupying the Cumberland Mountain plateau. The coal is mostly a semi-bituminous variety, admirably adapted for iron-smelting. The product in 1903 was 4,798,004 short tons, valued at $5,979,830. Middle Tennessee contains a large Lower Silurian area in the floor of its great basin, whose converging slopes and terraces are generally of Devonian and Subcarboniferous age. Petroleum, alum, gypsum, grindstones, glass-sand, marble, bat-guano (from caves), copperas, fictile clay, and iron are among the useful products of Middle Tennessee. Along the Tennessee River extends the western iron-belt, covering over 5000 sq. m., with huge banks or quarries of brown hematite of a good quality. The state's product of iron-ore in 1903 was 481,515 tons of brown hematite and 371,189 tons of red hematite. The greater part of West Tennessee is of Cretaceous and Tertiary age, but the Mississippi bottoms are of Quaternary and late formation. The Cretaceous and Tertiary contain lignite in abundance, and there are beds of valuable green-sand marl. Among the minerals of Tennessee must also be mentioned barytes, borax, Epsom salts (from caves and spring-waters), and salt from natural brines. Phosphate mining has developed into an important industry. The marbles are particularly varied in color, and include purely white, perfectly black, red, green, variegated, gray, breccia, and natural scagliola. Mineral springs are exceedingly numerous and prove useful in a very wide range of diseases.

Climate.—The generally considerable elevation of Tennessee secures it from the oppressive summer heat of the Gulf states; and the highland and mountain counties have a long and altogether delightful summer, while the winters are nowhere severe. The only unhealthy region is the swampy part of West Tennessee. The average annual rainfall varies from about 42 to 52 inches, being usually heaviest in the western sections.

Natural Productions.—The extensive forests of the state afford a very great variety of timber-trees. In the E. grow the white and other pines; in the W. the larch, cypress, and cottonwood; and almost everywhere the tulip-tree, hickories, the magnolias, sweet and black gum, black and white walnut, cherry, pecan, ash, maple, persimmon, sorrel-tree, locust, chicot, beech, several kinds of oak, etc. Middle Tennessee has great forests of red cedar. The lumber interest is one of the most important in the state, and Tennessee ranks foremost among the Southern States of the Union in the value of its lumber products. In the W. are extensive cane-brakes. Among the native fruits are the wild plum, the grape, persimmon, crab-apple, pawpaw, and many sorts of nuts and berries. Deer, the black bear, and many species of furred and feathered game abound. Among the reptiles the rattlesnake and cottonmouth are venomous.

Agriculture.—West Tennessee is extremely fertile, with a deep black mellow soil, and Indian corn and cotton are its great staples. Middle Tennessee is mostly very productive, though some few of its counties have a rocky and untoward soil, underlaid with cold and stubborn clays. This region is for the most part excellent grain and tobacco land, and grows much cotton, especially towards the S. The valley-lands of East Tennessee yield fine crops of corn and tobacco, and the winter wheat of this section is of unsurpassed excellence. Potatoes, sweet potatoes, oats, hay, hemp, and peanuts are important products of the state. The mountain-country affords excellent and extensive natural sheep-walks, and the abundant mast of the forests fattens many swine. Horses, neat cattle, swine, and mules are bred for export. The leading agricultural crops in 1900 were: corn, 56,997,880 bushels; wheat, 11,696,088 bushels; oats, 5,810,166 bushels; barley, 25,622 bushels; rye, 124,267 bushels; potatoes, 1,365,660 bushels; and hay, 313,432 tons. The orchard fruits, especially the apple, are extensively cultivated, and much attention is also given to the raising of berries and vegetables. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 1,002,469 pounds.

Manufactures.—The leading manufacturing industry of the state is flouring and grist-milling, whose chief seats are Nashville, Knoxville, and Memphis. The value of the product in 1900 was $21,798,929. The next most important industry is the manufacture of lumber- and timber-products (tar, turpentine, charcoal, tanner's bark, etc.), the aggregate value of which was $18,127,784. The mining and smelting of iron and copper are assuming large proportions. The product of pig-iron in 1900 was 362,190 tons and that of wrought iron and steel was considerable. The value of the iron and steel industry was reported at $5,080,624; that of the product from foundries and machine-shops, at $4,074,509. Zinc and zinc paints are produced in East Tennessee. The cotton and woollen manufactures in the state employ extensive capital; the textile products in 1900 were valued at $3,907,279. Cars, carriages, furniture, spirits, leather, metallic wares, and wines are other articles of manufacture. Wool-carding and boat-building are industries of some consequence. There were in the state in 1900 about 130 manufactories of tobacco and cigars. The product was valued at $3,010,602.

The railroads in 1851 had a length of 112 miles; in 1860, 1253 miles; in 1870, 1492 miles; in 1880, 1824 miles; in 1890, 2798 miles; and in 1900, 3189 miles.

The counties are 96,—namely, Anderson, Bedford, Benton, Bledsoe, Blount, Bradley, Campbell, Cannon, Carroll, Carter, Cheatham, Chester, Claiborne, Clay, Cocke, Coffee, Crockett, Cumberland, Davidson, Decatur, Dekalb, Dickson, Dyer, Fayette, Fentress, Franklin, Gibson, Giles, Grainger, Greene, Grundy, Hamblen, Hamilton, Hancock, Hardeman, Hardin, Hawkins, Haywood, Henderson, Henry, Hickman, Houston, Humphreys, Jackson, James, Jefferson, Johnson, Knox, Lake, Lauderdale, Lawrence, Lewis, Lincoln, Loudon, McMinn, McNairy, Macon, Madison, Marion, Marshall, Maury, Meigs, Monroe, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Obion, Overton, Perry, Pickett, Polk, Putnam, Rhea, Roane, Robertson, Rutherford, Scott, Sequatchie, Sevier, Shelby, Smith, Stewart, Sullivan, Sumner, Tipton, Trousdale, Unicoi, Union, Van Buren, Warren, Washington, Wayne, Weakley, White, Williamson, and Wilson.

The principal cities are Memphis, on the Mississippi, a great cotton mart (pop. in 1900, 102,320); Nashville, the state capital, on the Cumberland (80,365); Knoxville (32,637); Chattanooga, in the coal and iron district (30,154); Jackson (14,511); Clarksville (9431); Columbia (6052); Bristol, Cleveland, Dyersburg, Union City, Murfreesboro, Johnson City, and Harriman.

Education.—The leading educational institutions are the University of Nashville; the University of Tennessee, at Knoxville; the Vanderbilt University (Methodist Episcopal South), at Nashville; the Fisk University and the Roger Williams University, both for colored, also at Nashville; the University of the South (Episcopalian), at Sewanee; the Cumberland University (Cumberland Presbyterian), at Lebanon; the U. S. Grant University, at Chattanooga; Southwestern Presbyterian University, at Clarksville; American University, at Harriman; and Southwestern Baptist University, at Jackson. Among the normal schools may be mentioned the Chattanooga Normal University, the Peabody Normal College at Nashville, the Le Moyne Normal Institute at Memphis, and the Southern Normal University at Huntingdon. There are several schools of law, medicine, and divinity, and a large number of private and denominational academies and seminaries.

Government, etc.—The governor and the members of the legislature (senators and representatives) are chosen for a term of 2 years. The state has 10 representatives in the lower house of the national Congress.

The population in 1790 was 35,691; in 1800, 105,602; in 1810, 261,727; in 1820, 422,771; in 1830, 681,904; in 1840, 829,210; in 1850, 1,002,717; in 1860, 1,109,801; in 1870, 1,258,520; in 1880, 1,542,359; in 1890, 1,767,518; in 1900, 2,020,616. The negro population in 1900 numbered 480,430. There were only 17,746 foreign-born people in that year.

History.—The first white settlements in this region, which was originally included within the limits of North Carolina, were made just before the beginning of the Revolutionary War. In 1784 the settlers organized the state of Franklin, which existed only till 1788. North Carolina having ceded the region to the United States, Congress in 1790 passed an act for the organization of the "Territory South of the Ohio." In 1796 the state of Tennessee was admitted into the Union. In June, 1861, a majority of the people voted for secession. A great majority of the inhabitants of East Tennessee declared their adhesion to the Union, but were prevented from taking action by the presence of the Confederate forces. Some of the most important engagements of the Civil War were fought in Tennessee,—the battles of Stone River (Murfreesboro), Chickamauga, Chattanooga, and Nashville. Tennessee has given three presidents to the United States—Jackson, Polk, and Johnson.

Tennessee, a post-village of McDonough co., Ill., on the Burlington Route, 9 miles WSW. of Macomb. Pop. in 1900, 327.

Tennessee City, a post-hamlet of Dickson co., Tenn.

Tennessee Colony, a post-hamlet of Anderson co., Tex.

Tennessee Pass, Colo., a pass over the main range of the Rocky Mountains, has an elevation of 10,418 feet. Lat. 39° 21′ N.; lon. 106° 18′ W.

Tennessee Ridge, a post-hamlet of Houston co., Tenn., 23 miles W. of Clarksville.

Tennessee River is formed by the Clinch and Holston rivers, which rise in Virginia and unite at Kingston, Roane co., Tenn. It flows southwestward to Chattanooga, traverses several ridges of the Alleghany Mountains, and continues in nearly the same course to Guntersville, Ala. Beyond this point it flows W. by N. to the NE. corner of Mississippi, traverses in an almost due N. course the state of Tennessee, and then with a NW. deflection crosses Kentucky and discharges into the Ohio River at Paducah. It is the largest affluent of the Ohio River and is about 800 miles long, excluding the branches (or 1200 miles including the Holston). Large steamboats can ascend it to Florence, Ala., about 270 miles from its mouth, where the river is obstructed by the Muscle Shoals, which extend to Decatur, a distance of 23 miles, and around which navigation has been rendered practicable by means of canals. (See Muscle Shoals.) Above Decatur the river is again navigable for steamboats to Kingston.

Tenney, a post-village of Wilkin co., Minn., on the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie R. The banking point is Fairmount, N.Dak.

Tennille, ten′nĭl, a post-village of Pike co., Ala., on the Atlantic Coast Line. The banking point is Troy. Pop. 100.

Tennille, a banking post-town of Washington co., Ga., on the main line of the Central of Georgia and other railroads, 55 miles E. by N. of Macon. It has manufactures of cotton-yarns, cotton-seed oil, and fertilizers. Pop. in 1900, 1121.

Tennstedt, tĕnn′stĕtt, a town of Prussian Saxony, 15 miles NNW. of Erfurt. Pop. in 1900, 2816.

Tennyson, a post-town of Warrick co., Ind. The banking point is Booneville. Pop. in 1900, 302.

The town contains many mosques, some of them spacious and of handsome Moorish architecture. The harbor is protected by two forts at the mouth of the river. The principal manufactures of Tetuan are of wool, silk, leather, and fire-arms. It exports grain, wool, and live-stock, chiefly to Gibraltar and Spain. The population is estimated at about 25,000, of which 6000 are Jews.

Teuchern, toiĸ'ẹrn, a town of Prussian Saxony, 17 miles S. of Merseburg. It has an old castle. In the vicinity are many mines of lignite and the extraction of coal products is extensively carried on. Pop. in 1900, 5588.

Teuco, a river of the Argentine Republic, is a northern tributary of the Rio Vermejo.

Teufen, toif'fẹn, a town of Switzerland, canton of Appenzell Outer Rhodes, 4 miles N. of Appenzell. It has manufactures of Swiss muslin and embroideries. Pop. in 1900, 4612.

Teuk-Cham, tā'ook chăm, a city of the Japanese island of Formosa, on its W. coast, 45 miles SW. of Tamsui. It exports sugar and large quantities of peanut oil.

Teulada, tā'oo-lā'dā, a small town of Spain, in Alicante, near the Mediterranean, 9 miles S. of Denia.

Teulada (tā-oo-lā'dā), Cape, on the S. coast of Sardinia, at the E. entrance to the Gulf of Palmas. Lat. 38° 51′ N.; lon. 8° 39′ E.

Teutoburger Wald, toi'to-bo͝oR'gheR vȧlt, a low mountain-range extending in a SE. and NW. direction through the northeastern part of the Prussian province of Westphalia and covering a part of Lippe and of Hanover. Its highest summit is elevated but little more than 1500 feet above the sea. The length of the range is nearly 100 miles. It is noted for the crushing defeat inflicted in A.D. 9 upon the Romans under Varus, by Hermann (Arminius), the leader of the Cherusci, not far from its southeastern termination, in a district designated by Tacitus as the Teutoburgiensis Saltus.

Teutopolis, tew-top'o-lis, a post-village of Effingham co., Ill., on the Vandalia Line, 4 miles ENE. of Effingham. It contains St. Joseph's College (Catholic). Pop. in 1900, 498.

Tevere, a river of Italy. See Tiber.

Teverone, tā-vā-ro'nā, or Aniene, ä-ne-ā'nā (anc. Anio), a river of Italy, which rises in the Apennines, flows W. past Subiaco and Tivoli, and joins the Tiber 4 miles N. of Rome. Length, 70 miles.

Teviot, tiv'e-ot, a river of Scotland, co. of Roxburgh, joins the Tweed at Kelso, after a NE. course of 34 miles.

Teviotdale, tiv'e-ot-dale, a name applied to the co. of Roxburgh, Scotland.

Teviotdale, a post-village of Wellington co., Ontario, 23 miles WNW. of Elora. Pop. 150.

Teviston, or Bowie, a post-village of Cochise co., Ariz., 66 miles by rail NE. of Benson.

Tewkesbury, tūks'bẹr-e, a municipal borough of England, co. and 10 miles NNE. of Gloucester, on the Avon, at its confluence with the Severn. It is noted for its noble abbey-church, one of the finest English specimens of Norman architecture, with an imposing tower, curious west façade, and ancient tombs and chapels. Other objects of interest are the Gate House and numerous old timbered dwellings. Here on May 4, 1471, the Yorkists vanquished the Lancastrians. Pop. in 1901, 5419.

Tewksbury, a post-village in Tewksbury township (town), Middlesex co., Mass., on the Boston and Maine R., 5 miles ESE. of Lowell. Pop. of the town in 1900, 3683.

Texanna, a post-village of the Cherokee Nation, I.T. Pop. 80.

Texarkana, tex'ar-kan'ạh, a municipality composed of adjacent cities, one the capital of Miller co., Ark., and the other situated in Bowie co., Tex. It is on the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern, the St. Louis, Southwestern and other railroads, 145 miles SW. of Little Rock. It has car- and engine-works, foundries and machine-shops, cotton-compresses and cotton-seed oil mills, manufactures of lumber, furniture, etc. The St. Agnes Academy is located here (Arkansas). Pop. in 1900, of Texarkana, Ark., 4914; of Texarkana, Tex., 5256.

Texas, the largest state in the American Union and the southwesternmost of the Gulf states, is bounded on the N. and E. by New Mexico, Oklahoma, Indian Territory, Arkansas, and Louisiana, SE. by the Gulf of Mexico, SW. by Mexico (from which it is separated by the Rio Grande), and W. by New Mexico. Its northernmost limit is the parallel of 36° 30′ N. lat.; the most southerly point, a short distance from Brownsville, is in lat. 25° 51′ N. From lon. 100° W. eastward the Red River is the northern boundary. Area of the land-surface, 262,290 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 3490 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—Texas may be divided topographically into a number of NE.–SW. belts which succeed one another serially westward or northwestward from the Gulf. The easternmost of these is a part of the great coastal plain of the United States, which occupies a broad area and rises in its higher points to 600–700 feet. Beyond this follows an area of 600–2000 ft. elevation, bordered on the W. by the prominent escarpment of the "staked plain" (Llano Estacado), a plateau varying from 1000 ft. elevation in the S. to 4000–5000 ft. in the N. A considerable portion of the western half of the state belongs to the region of the Great Plains. South of New Mexico and the Pecos River the country is mountainous. Here are the Organ Mountains, the Sierras del Alamo, del Diablo, Blanca, Aquila, Monina, Guadalupe, Apache, Pancut, Charrote, etc., extending for the most part indefinitely and irregularly southeastward, interspersed with salt plains and table-lands, where slender arroyos and infrequent water-holes alone prevent the country from being impassable. Some of these mountains probably have their orographic continuations in the N. of Mexico. Among the loftiest elevations of the state are Baldy Peak, 8382 ft.; Black Mountain, 7550 ft.; Blue Mountain, 7330 ft.; Chinati Peak, 7730 ft.; and Sawtooth Mountain, 7748 ft. Between the Sabine River (which forms the greater part of the boundary with Louisiana) and the Trinity there are extensive level and sandy pine forests, northward of which the country is rolling, well timbered, and fertile. Central Texas, as far W. as the Colorado, is very generally prairie, with timber belts along the streams, but in the N. there is an extensive forest, the "Cross-Timbers," consisting mainly of post-oak and black-jack, and northwestward is a region called the "mezquite timber," from the abundance of its mezquite trees. Western Texas is generally a dry, pastoral region, with an invigorating climate, varied scenery, and a generally ample supply of clear water in its streams, wells, and springs; but northward there are tracts where the water is salt or in other cases is so charged with lime-salts as not to be potable. Along the Rio Grande the country is frequently barren, and its growth of mezquite and post-oak is so small as to constitute no longer a forest, but a thicket or chaparral. The coast-lands of Texas are everywhere low and frequently sandy or marshy.

Rivers.—The rivers Sabine and Neches reach the sea through the Sabine Lake and its Pass, and both afford some navigation. The Angelina, an affluent of the Neches, is also navigated in high water. Into Galveston Bay flow the Trinity River and Buffalo Bayou, both navigable for steamboats. The Brazos has been navigated by steam for 300 miles, but at low water its channels are encumbered by shifting shoals. Matagorda Bay receives the Colorado, which has been rendered navigable to Austin. The Guadalupe, San Antonio, and Nueces afford but few commercial facilities. The Rio Grande in its lower course is a fairly large stream, crooked and swift, with a bad bar at its mouth, but steam navigation is practicable at periods of high-water for some distance upon it. Its principal tributary is the Pecos, a long but slender stream. East of the 100th meridian Texas is for the most part well watered, with numerous streams. The Red River receives from Texas the Canadian, Pease, Big Wichita, and Little Wichita rivers, and the Sulphur Fork, besides several upper forks and headstreams. The chief affluents of the Brazos are the Leon, Clear Fork, and Navasota. Into the Colorado flow the Llano, Concho, San Saba, and Salt Fork. The San Marcos flows into the Guadalupe, the Medina into the San Antonio, and the Rio Frio into the Nueces. The Red River and Big Cypress Bayou afford important steamboat navigation for the NE. section.

The coast-line is about 400 miles in extent. The low peninsulas of Bolivar and Matagorda, and the sand islands of Galveston, San Luis, Matagorda, St. Joseph, Mustang, Padre, and Brazos, fence four-fifths of the main coast-line from the waves of the gulf, being separated from the mainland by a series of bays and lagoons, of which the principal are Galveston, Trinity, San Luis, Matagorda, Tres Palacios, Lavaca, San Antonio, Espiritu Santo, St. Charles, Corpus Christi, and the Laguna del Madre. Galveston is the seat of most of the maritime trade.

Geology, Minerals.—Azoic and ancient Paleozoic rocks appear in the mountain-ridges on the upper Rio Grande, but the great formations of Texas are the Cretaceous and the Tertiary. A line running from the NE. angle of the state, on the Arkansas boundary-line, southwestward to Austin, and thence to San Antonio, and extending in the same general course to the Rio Grande, would roughly divide the Tertiary on the E. from the Cretaceous on the W.; on the sea-coast the Tertiary gives place to Quaternary and recent formations. The Permian and Jura-Trias together cover a large part of the remainder of Texas, probably including a portion of the Staked Plain. There is in the W. a large expanse of the Carboniferous, reappearing in the upper valley of the Colorado. The main coal-field underlies an area of perhaps 12,000 sq. m. Brown and black lignites of the Tertiary are also abundant. There are large and important deposits of iron (magnetic, etc.), copper, and argentiferous galena in the W. and NW. counties; bismuth and other metals are also found. The output of coal in 1903 was 926,759 short tons, valued at $1,505,383. Salt springs and lakes are numerous in the NW., and along the Gulf shore there are extensive and productive salt-lagoons. The production of salt in 1903 was 314,000 barrels. Petroleum has latterly been obtained in large quantities, and the state stood, in 1903, third in rank among the states of the Union as a producer of this substance—17,955,572 barrels, valued at $7,517,479. The greater part of this output is from the Beaumont pool (discovered in 1901) and the Sour Lake area in Hardin co.

Climate.—The gulf coast has a long and hot summer, tempered by sea-breezes, and modified by occasional "northers" (as the cooler storm-winds are called), which sometimes last four or five days. The high inland prairies have a delightful climate throughout the year. W. of the meridian of 100° W. lon. the summers are too dry for agriculture, except where irrigation is practicable. As a whole, Texas is remarkably healthful, except that in the low grounds and moist prairies malarial fevers are apt to prevail. The coast-towns are exposed to visitations of fever; and along the Rio Grande the singular break-bone fever (or dengue) is endemic. The mean summer temperature at Galveston is about 84° and at El Paso, 82°. In the lower coast-region the temperature rarely descends to the freezing point, but in the western and northern highlands it may fall to zero, or even considerably lower. The average annual rainfall, which is 50–60 inches in parts of the coast-strip, diminishes rapidly westward, and at El Paso is only about 10 inches.

Fauna and Flora.—Among the native wild animals are the bear, puma (rare), deer, peccary, civet, armadillo, raccoon, coyote, opossum, etc. Many birds visit this state which are never seen elsewhere in the United States. The tarantula, scorpion, centipede, wood-tick, chigoe, and locust are troublesome insect pests in some parts. Here are also found the interesting agricultural ants. Among the trees are the long- and short-leaved pine, cypress, live- and post-oak, blackjack, pecan, hickory, mulberry, plane, buckeye, walnut, bois d'arc, and locust. The mezquite affords excellent fuel, besides gum, tanners' bark, and edible pods and seeds. The mustang grape and post-oak grape are among the excellent native fruits, and the former is thought to be of a species peculiar to Texas. Palm trees grow in the SW. In the W. grow native species of ebony and lignum-vitæ, and there are many large and small species of cactus, some of which, when deprived of their spines, are fed to cattle and mules. A characteristic plant of the W. is the yucca (or Spanish bayonet).

Agriculture.—On the coast sea-island cotton is grown. The deep, stiff alluvium of the river-bottoms near the gulf is adapted to sugar-culture and is unsurpassed for cotton. The prairies (both black and chocolate) are fine corn- and cotton-lands. In the SE. rice does well, and, as a rule, all the eastern and central sections are adapted to cotton and corn and to the raising of live-stock and fruits. Swine thrive upon the abundant mast of the timbered lands. Wheat of special excellence is grown in the N., centre, and W.; but the general occupation westward is cattle-raising and wool-growing. The broken and hilly country presents facilities for irrigation, which is destined greatly to extend the area of cultivable land. Texas is the leading cotton-growing state of the Union and produced a commercial crop in 1899–1900 of 2,438,555 bales. The acreage under cotton in 1900 was 6,960,367. The leading agricultural crops in 1900 were: corn, 81,962,910 bushels; wheat, 23,395,913 bushels; oats, 28,278,232 bushels; barley, 50,405 bushels; rye, 64,630 bushels; potatoes, 916,918 bushels; and hay, 548,879 tons. Orchard fruits are extensively cultivated. Wine is produced to a considerable extent. The European wine-grape does well in the NW., and El Paso formerly was noted for its pleasant "Pass" wines and brandies. Figs and oranges thrive in the southern parts. Texas takes a leading position among the states of the Union in the industry of stock-raising, which, with agriculture, is its main pursuit. It far surpasses every other state in the number of its cattle (nearly 10,000,000, including spring calves, in 1900). The amount of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 14,485,225 pounds.

Manufactures are not yet extensively established. Carriages, wagons, bricks, flour, meat extracts, furniture, castings, lumber, beer, cotton-seed oil, saddlery, harnesses, lime, salt, and woollens are manufactured. The lumber and timber products, which constitute the most important item in the manufactured products of the state, were valued in 1900 at $17,801,770. Of second rank is the manufacture of cotton-seed oil and cake, the product of which was valued at $14,005,324. Associated with this industry is the ginning of cotton, the receipts from which in the same year amounted to $5,886,923. The flouring and grist-mill products were valued at $12,333,730. There were in the state in 1899 189 manufactories of cigars and tobacco, which turned out 13,201,404 cigars.

Railroads.—In 1854 there were 54 miles of railroad; in 1860, 307 miles; in 1870, 711 miles; in 1880, 3244 miles; in 1890, 8710 miles; and in 1900, 9886 miles.

Counties.—These in 1900 numbered 243, as follows: Anderson, Andrews, Angelina, Aransas, Archer, Armstrong, Atascosa, Austin, Bailey, Bandera, Bastrop, Baylor, Bee, Bell, Bexar, Blanco, Borden, Bosque, Bowie, Brazoria, Brazos, Brewster, Briscoe, Brown, Burleson, Burnet, Caldwell, Calhoun, Callahan, Cameron, Camp, Carson, Cass, Castro, Chambers, Cherokee, Childress, Clay, Cochran, Coke, Coleman, Collin, Collingsworth, Colorado, Comal, Comanche, Concho, Cooke, Coryell, Cottle, Crane, Crockett, Crosby, Dallam, Dallas, Dawson, Deaf Smith, Delta, Denton, Dewitt, Dickens, Dimmit, Donley, Duval, Eastland, Ector, Edwards, Ellis, El Paso, Erath, Falls, Fannin, Fayette, Fisher, Floyd, Foard, Fort Bend, Franklin, Freestone, Frio, Gaines, Galveston, Garza, Gillespie, Glasscock, Goliad, Gonzales, Gray, Grayson, Gregg, Grimes, Guadalupe, Hale, Hall, Hamilton, Hansford, Hardeman, Hardin, Harris, Harrison, Hartley, Haskell, Hays, Hemphill, Henderson, Hidalgo, Hill, Hockley, Hood, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Hunt, Hutchinson, Irion, Jack, Jackson, Jasper, Jeff Davis, Jefferson, Johnson, Jones, Karnes, Kaufman, Kendall, Kent, Kerr, Kimble, King, Kinney, Knox, Lamar, Lamb, Lampasas, Lasalle, Lavaca, Lee, Leon, Liberty, Limestone, Lipscomb, Live Oak, Llano, Loving, Lubbock, Lynn, McCulloch, McLennan, McMullen, Madison, Marion, Martin, Mason, Matagorda, Maverick, Medina, Menard, Midland, Milam, Mills, Mitchell, Montague, Montgomery, Moore, Morris, Motley, Nacogdoches, Navarro, Newton, Nolan, Nueces, Ochiltree, Oldham, Orange, Palo Pinto, Panola, Parker, Parmer, Pecos, Polk, Potter, Presidio, Rains, Randall, Red River, Reeves, Refugio, Roberts, Robertson, Rockwall, Runnels, Rusk, Sabine, San Augustine, San Jacinto, San Patricio, San Saba, Schleicher, Scurry, Shackelford, Shelby, Sherman, Smith, Somervell, Starr, Stephens, Sterling, Stonewall, Sutton, Swisher, Tarrant, Taylor, Terry, Throckmorton, Titus, Tom Green, Travis, Trinity, Tyler, Upshur, Upton, Uvalde, Valverde, Van Zandt, Victoria, Walker, Waller, Ward, Washington, Webb, Wharton, Wheeler, Wichita, Wilbarger, Williamson, Wilson, Winkler, Wise, Wood, Yoakum, Young, Zapata, and Zavala.

The chief cities and towns are: San Antonio (pop. 53,321), Houston (44,633), Dallas (42,638), Galveston (37,789), Fort Worth (26,688), Austin (the capital, 22,258), Waco (20,686), El Paso (15,906), Laredo (13,429), and Denison (11,807).

Education.—The richly endowed state university (University of Texas) is located at Austin and Galveston. Other collegiate institutions are the Fort Worth University; the Southwestern University, at Georgetown; the Southeast Texas Male and Female College, at Jasper; St. Mary's University, at Galveston; Baylor University, at Waco; Wiley University (for colored students), at Marshall; the West Texas Military Academy, at San Antonio; and the state agricultural and mechanical college, near Bryan. There are normal institutes at Huntsville, Prairie View, Austin, etc.

Government, etc.—The governor and other state officers are elected for a term of 2 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of the former being elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. The state has 16 votes in the lower house of the national Congress.

Population.—In 1850 there were 212,592 inhabitants; in 1860, 604,215; in 1870, 818,579; in 1880, 1,591,749; in 1890, 2,235,523; in 1900, 3,048,710. The negroes in 1900 numbered 620,722, and the foreign-born, 179,357.

History.—Previous to 1836 Texas belonged to Mexico, which emancipated itself from the rule of Spain in 1821. Many Spanish missions were planted in the region in the course of the eighteenth century, but as a result of the attacks of the Comanches and Apaches, the inroads of lawless adventurers from the United States, and the rising against Spain in Mexico, nothing came of this civilizing activity. In the years following the achievement of Mexican independence there was a large influx of immigrants from the United States. In 1835 an insurrection broke out against Mexican rule, and the victory of Houston over Santa Anna, the Mexican president, at San Jacinto, in April, 1836, secured the liberation of the country. In the same year Houston was inaugurated president of the republic of Texas. In 1845 the congress of the United States offered to admit Texas as a state into the Union. The offer was accepted and the formal admission took place before the close of the year. The war between the United States and Mexico (1846–48) grew out of the dispute regarding the boundary of Texas. In 1850 Texas sold to the United States her claims to territory outside of her present limits.

Texas, a county in the S. part of Missouri, has an area of 1157 sq. m. It is drained by the Current River, the Piney Fork of the Gasconade, and Roubidoux Creek. Capital, Houston. Pop. in 1890, 19,406; in 1900, 22,192.

Texas, a post-village of Marion co., Ala., about 24 miles SE. of Hamilton.

Texas, a post-village of Heard co., Ga., 18 miles NW. of Lagrange.

Texas, a post-village of Washington co., Ky., about 44 miles SW. of Lexington. Pop. 100.

Texas, a post-village of Baltimore co., Md., on the Northern Central R. The banking point is Cockeysville. Pop. about 500.

Texas, a post-village of Kalamazoo co., Mich., about 10 miles SW. of Kalamazoo. Pop. 125.

Texas, a post-village of Oswego co., N.Y., on Lake Ontario, about 14 miles ENE. of Oswego.

Texas, a post-village of Henry co., Ohio, on the Maumee River, about 30 miles SW. of Toledo. Pop. 125.

Texas, a township of Wayne co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 3951.

Texas, a post-station of Tucker co., W.Va.

Texas, a township (town) of Marathon co., Wis. Pop. in 1900, 1081.

Texas City, a post-hamlet of Saline co., Ill., on the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis R., 12 miles NE. of Harrisburg.

Texas City, a post-village of Galveston co., Tex., on the W. shore of Galveston Bay and on the Texas City Terminal R., 4½ miles by rail NW. of Galveston. Pop. about 350.

Texascreek, a post-hamlet of Fremont co., Colo., 32 miles W. of Cañon City.

Texas Valley, a post-village of Cortland co., N.Y., 5 miles NE. of Marathon. Pop. 200.

Texcoco, tĕs-ko'ko, or Texcuco, a lake of Mexico, state and about 2½ miles E. of the city of Mexico. It is the lowest of the lakes in this region and, lying on the plane of the capital city, has been the cause of frequent inundations. Its waters are now regulated by the great drainage-canal. Depth, about 2 feet. The lake was once much more extensive than at present and surrounded the ancient city of Mexico (Tenochtitlán).

Texcoco, or Texcuco, a town of Mexico, state and about 16 miles ENE. of the city of Mexico, near the E. shore of the lake of its own name. In ancient times it was the second city in the country and, though still a place of some importance, now derives its chief interest from historical associations and remains of antiquity (pyramids, temples, etc.). The modern town contains many handsome edifices, both public and private, has railroad-shops and manufactures of woollen and cotton goods and glass, and carries on an active trade with Mexico. Pop. in 1900, 5930.

Texel, tĕx'ĕl, the southwesternmost and largest of the Frisian Islands, forming part of the Dutch province of North Holland, from the main-land of which it is separated by the Marsdiep, a strait but little more than 2 miles across. Length, about 15 miles; greatest breadth, 6 miles. Area, 67 sq. m. The island contains fine pastures, on which numerous sheep are reared, from whose milk excellent cheese is made. Its N. part, originally a separate island, is termed Eijerland ("Eggland"), from the great abundance of eggs deposited there by wild fowl. Pop. in 1899, 5954.

Texhoma, a post-village of Beaver co., Okla., on the Chicago, Rock Island and Gulf and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Rs. The banking point is Guymon.

Texline, a post-village, capital of Dallam co., Tex., 65 miles NW. of Channing, on the Fort Worth and Denver City and the Colorado and Southern Rs. Pop. 180.

Texola, a banking post-village of Greer co., Okla., on the Chicago, Rock Island and Gulf and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Rs. Pop. 250.

Texutla, a town of Central America. See TEJUTLA.

Teyde or Teide, Peak of. See TENERIFFE.

Teynga, tain'gȧ, the northernmost of the Sulu Islands.

Teza, tȧ'zȧ (written also Teja), a town of Morocco, kingdom and 68 miles E. of Fez, on an affluent of the Sebu.

Teziutlán, tȧ-se-oot-lȧn', a town of Mexico, state and 70 miles NE. of the city of Puebla. Pop. in 1900, 11,265.

Tez'pur', a town of British India, in Assam, on the Brahmaputra River, 75 miles above Gauhati. Pop. about 5000.

Thaba Bosigo, tȧ'bȧ bo'se-go', a village of Basutoland, southern Africa, about 67 miles E. by S. of Bloemfontein.

Thaba-N'Chu, a village of the Orange River Colony, 35 miles by road from Bloemfontein.

Thacker, a post-village of Mingo co., W.Va. The banking point is Williamson. It has coal- and coke-industries.

Thackerville, a post-town of the Chickasaw Nation, I.T., on the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fé R. The banking point is Gainesville, Tex. Pop. in 1900, 154.

Thackery, a post-village of Hamilton co., Ill., on the Louisville and Nashville R., 17 miles W. of Carmi.

Thal, tȧl, a village and parish of Switzerland, canton and ENE. of St. Gall.

Thale, tȧ'lẹh, a village and health-resort of Prussia, province of Saxony, SW. of Magdeburg, near the Harz Mountains. It is a busy industrial place and has great iron-works. Pop. in 1900, 9467.

Thalheim, tȧl'hīme, a village of Saxony, district of Chemnitz. It has establishments connected with the textile industry and numerous hosiery-factories. Pop. in 1900, 5790.

Thalweil, tȧl'v̂ile, a village of Switzerland, canton and 6 miles S. of Zürich, on the Lake of Zürich.

Thame, tame, a river of England, cos. of Buckingham and Oxford, after a SW. course of 40 miles, joins the Thames from the left, between Abingdon and Wallingford.

Thame, a town of England, co. and 12 miles ESE. of Oxford, on the S. bank of the Thame. Pop. in 1901, 2911.

Thames, têmz (anc. Tam'esis), the principal, though not the longest, river of England, through the S. part of which it flows, in a generally eastward and very tortuous course. Its head-streams, the Churn and Isis (or Thames), rise on the slopes of the Cotswold Hills in Gloucestershire. The stream formed by the junction, which is soon enlarged by the influx of the Colne and Leach, flows in an ENE. direction to a point about 5 miles NW. of Oxford, which is the first important town on its banks. It continues its SE. course to Reading, after which its course is mostly E., with great bends and windings, until it pours its waters into the North Sea through a broad estuary. The estuary proper (reckoned as far as the Nore light) expands to a width of about 8 miles, but the broadening waters for some distance beyond are often regarded as belonging to the estuarine area. The estuary of the Medway opens into that of the Thames. Among the affluents of the Thames from the N. are the Cherwell, Thame, and Colne. From the S. the principal affluent, in addition to the Medway, is the Kennet. On the S. side of the entrance to the estuary is the island of Sheppey. London is situated on both banks of the Thames, about 60 miles from its mouth. The river has a winding course through the city, with an average width of about 1000 feet. Ocean steamers ascend the Thames to London, but those of the greatest draught cannot go above Tilbury, about midway between London and the mouth of the river. At London, and below, the accommodation provided for shipping is of the most extensive and magnificent description. The length of the Thames is about 215 miles. The tide ascends as far as Oxford, and the stream is navigated by barges some distance further up. On the S. bank of the Thames below London proper are Greenwich, Woolwich, and Gravesend. Among the places situated between Reading and London (descending) are Henley, Great Marlow, Eton, Windsor, Chertsey, Kingston, Twickenham, Richmond, Brentford, and Chiswick. The Thames separates the cos. of Oxford, Buckingham, Middlesex, and Essex on the N. from Berkshire, Surrey, and Kent on the S.

Thames (locally pronounced thāmz), a tidal estuary of southeastern Connecticut, which receives the Yantic River and the united waters of the Shetucket and Quinebaug rivers. It extends almost due N. for about 15 miles and enters Long Island Sound 3 miles below New London. Steamboats ascend it to Norwich. The mouth of this river forms an excellent harbor for the port of New London.

Thames, têmz, a river of Ontario, flows through the peninsula between Lakes Huron and Erie, and, after a SW. course of 160 miles, enters Lake St. Clair. It is navigable from its mouth to Chatham, besides which town, London and Oxford are on its banks.

Thames, têmz, or Wai-Ho, wī'ho, a river of New Zealand, in North Island, after a northward course joins the sea by an estuary known as the Firth of the Thames.

Thames, a post-town of New Zealand, in North Island, about 40 miles SE. of Auckland. It is the emporium of the Thames gold-fields. Pop. about 5000.

Thamesford, têmz'fȯrd, a banking post-village of Oxford co., Ontario, on the river Thames, 5 miles W. of Ingersoll, on the Canadian Pacific R. Pop. about 600.

Thamesville, thāmz'vĭl, a hamlet on the Thames River, 1 mile S. of Norwich, Conn.

Theiss, tīce (Hun. Tisza, tis'sŏh`), the longest affluent of the Danube, and next to it the most important river of Hungary, most of whose eastern half is drained by it and its tributaries. It rises in the Carpathian Mountains, in the co. of Marmaros, on the borders of Galicia, and is formed by the union of the Black and White Theiss, E. of Sziget. Its course is W., with great bends and windings, to Tokay, whence it has a SW. course to Szolnok, and thence a S. course, flowing parallel with the Danube, which it joins on the left between the Banat and Slavonia, 22 miles SE. of Peterwardein. It is almost throughout extremely tortuous, and if we reckon its minor windings, its length is upward of 800 miles. It is navigable for light-draught steamboats for about 450 miles. The chief affluents are the Szamos, Körös, Maros, and Béga from the left, and the Sajó from the right. Not far from its mouth the Theiss is connected with the Danube by the Franzenskanal. Thermopylæ, ther-mop'e-le (Gr. Θερμοπύλαι,—i.e., "the hot gates," referring to the thermal springs located there), a famous pass of Greece, between an eastern ridge of Mount Œta and the Gulf of Lamia (Maliac Gulf), on the road leading from Thessaly to middle Hellas. In ancient times it was a narrow passage, several miles in length, hemmed in on one side by precipitous rocks and on the other side by the sea, but the configuration of the ground is entirely changed, mainly through the deposits brought down by the river Hellada (Sperchius), and there is no longer a narrow pass, but instead a level plain of considerable width. The Pass of Thermopylæ is memorable for the valiant stand made there in the year 480 B.C. by Leonidas and his band of Spartans against the Persian host of Xerxes and the heroic death of the defenders. The Polyandrium, an ancient tumulus, with the remains of a square pedestal, built of blocks of red marble breccia, marks the spot. In 191 B.C. the forces of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, were defeated at Thermopylæ by the Romans. Near here are remarkable hot springs, to which the pass owes its name.

Thessaly (L. Thessalia, from Gr. Θεσσαλία), the northeasternmost division of ancient Greece, situated between Epirus on the W. and the Ægean Sea on the E., and bounded on the N. by Macedonia. The region consists mainly of fertile plains, drained by the Peneus (the modern Salamvria). On the borders are lofty mountains, including the range of the Pindus on the W., Mount Olympus on the N., and mounts Ossa and Pelion on the E. The Vale of Tempe, traversed by the Peneus, presents a break in the mountains which here border the Ægean Sea. Among the prominent towns in ancient times were Larisa (Larissa), Crannon, Pheræ, Pagasæ, and Pharsalus (Fersala). The cities were united in a loose confederacy. After having been united for a brief time under the tyrants of Pheræ, the country passed in the middle of the fourth century B.C. under the rule of Macedon. The Greek Revolution (1821–29) liberated the southern part of Thessaly from the Turkish yoke. The bulk of the region remained a part of Turkey until 1881, when the great powers compelled the sultan to cede most of it to Greece. Thessaly comprises the nomarchies of Larissa, Magnesia, Trikala, and Karditsa. The nomarchy of Phthiotis also formed part of ancient Thessaly in a wider sense. The region as a whole is still called by its ancient name.

Thurber, a post-village of Wayne co., Utah. The banking point is Richfield. Pop. 300.

Thurgau, toor′gŏw (Fr. Thurgovie, tŭr`go`vee′; L. Thurgovia), a canton of Switzerland, in its NE. part, having N. and NE. the Lake of Constance and the Rhine, separating it from Baden and Württemberg, and on the other sides the cantons of St. Gall, Zürich, and Schaffhausen. Area, 381 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 113,221, of whom two-thirds were Protestants. The principal river is the Thur, an affluent of the Rhine. The canton produces much fruit and wine, and the product of the dairies is large. Spinning, weaving, and the manufacture of embroideries are extensively carried on. The governing bodies are an executive council and a Great Council, both elected by the people. Capital, Frauenfeld. The existence of Thurgau as an independent canton dates only from 1803.

Thuringia, thu-rin′je-ạ (Ger. Thüringen, tü′ring-ẹn), in a strict sense the designation of a region in the central part of Germany, between the Harz Mountains on the N. and the Thuringian Forest on the S., drained mainly by the Saale and its affluent, the Unstrut. A wide application is, however, given to the name, and in speaking of the so-called Thuringian States we include Saxe-Weimar, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, Säxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Altenburg, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, and the two Reuss principalities. Between these states are various Prussian districts. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries the landgraves of Thuringia played a conspicuous rôle among the German princes. Their seat was the famous castle of Wartburg, near Eisenach. For a time the Minnesingers shed lustre upon their court. The old line of landgraves became extinct in 1247. The landgraviate then passed to the house of Wettin, which ruled in the margraviate of Meissen, and which early in the fifteenth century came into possession of the electoral duchy of Saxony. From 1485 Thuringia belonged to the Ernestine line of the house of Wettin. Here after the Reformation arose the various Saxon duchies.

Thuringian Forest (Ger. Thüringer Wald, tü′ring-ẹr wȧlt), a mountain-range of central Germany, extending in a NW. direction from the Frankenwald (in the extreme N. of Bavaria) as far as the Werra, where that river is joined by the Hörsel, near Eisenach, a distance of between 60 and 70 miles. It is mainly in Saxe-Coburg-Gotha and Saxe-Weimar, but also covers parts of Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt and Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, as well as a small district belonging to Prussia. Its culminating points, situated to the W. of Ilmenau, are the Gross Beerberg, 3238 feet, and the Schneekopf, which is a few feet lower. The mountains are composed chiefly of porphyry, granite, and schists. They are clad to their summits with dense forests, chiefly of pine, and are broken by romantic valleys. The Thuringian Forest is one of the favorite resorts of the Germans. The region is the seat of great industrial activity. The minerals include iron, copper, and manganese. The drainage is shared by tributaries of the Elbe, the Weser, and the Main.

Thurles, thŭrlz, a town of Ireland, co. and 21 miles NE. of Tipperary, on the Suir. Here is the cathedral of the Roman Catholic archbishopric of Cashel. Pop. about 5000.

Tiahuanaco, te-ȧ-wȧ-nȧ′ko, a village of Bolivia, department and 38 miles WNW. of La Paz. Near it, between lakes Titicaca and Aullagas, is a site remarkable for vast ruins and gigantic monuments that are assumed to have been the work of the Incas or Aymarás.

Tia Juana, te′ȧ wȧ′nȧ, a post-village of San Diego co., Cal. The banking point is San Diego. Pop. 100.

Tian-Shan, or Thian-Shan (i.e., "celestial mountains"), an important mountain-system of Central Asia, forming in part the boundary between Russian and Chinese (or Eastern) Turkestan, and extending generally northeastward from the Pamir to about lon. 92° or 95° E., where it is lost in the minor ridges that disappear in the western region of the Gobi desert. It forms the water-parting between the Tarim basin on one side and the basins of Dzungaria and the Balkash on the other. The system links itself on the Pamir wall with the Alai Mountains, trending almost directly westward, and with the Sarikol (Sirikol), a southerly range which connects with the Kuen-lun, the Karakorum, and the Hindu-Kush. The Bogdo-Ola Mountains, which border the deep depression of Luktchun on the N., may properly be considered to be the farthest extension northeastward of the Tian-Shan, while westward, apart from the connection with the Alai, to which reference has already been made, the system is continued in the numerous ridges of the Ala-Tau and their included valleys and steppes in Semiryetchensk and Ferghana. The central Tian-Shan has a general elevation of 15,000 to 20,000 feet, is heavily snow-capped, and has many giant glaciers (Semenov, Mushketov, Zerafshan), which in places descend to the 10,000-foot level or lower. The tree-growth (pine, spruce) is heavy to about 9000–9500 ft. The more important streams rising or having some of their head-waters in the Tian-Shan are the Narym, Ili, Zerafshan, and Tarim. The principal pass is the Terek in the SW., on the route from Ferghana to Kashgar. Khan-Tengri, assumed to be the loftiest summit, has a height of 24,000 (?) ft.

Tiaón, te-ä-ōn′, a pueblo of Tayabas province, Luzon, Philippine Islands, on the Tiaón River, and SW. of Majayjay volcano. Pop. in 1903, 9527.

Tiaret (Fr. pron. te`ä-rä′), a town of Algeria, department and 105 miles SE. of Oran, with which it is connected by rail. Pop. in 1901, 4606.

Tiashoke, tī′ą-shōk, a post-village of Rensselaer co., N.Y., 20 miles NNE. of Troy. Pop. 100.

Tibagy, te-bä-zhee′, a river of Brazil, state of São Paulo, joins the Paranapaneme after a NW. course of 200 miles, for the most part of which it is navigable. On it is the village of Tibagy.

Tibbee Station, a post-village of Clay co., Miss., on the Oktibbeha River and on the Mobile and Ohio R., 5½ miles S. of West Point. Pop. 75.

Tib`bu′ Country, a region of north-central Africa, comprising a great part of the Sahara SE. of Fezzan and between that country and Wadai. It is named from its people, called Tibbus (Tebu).

Tiber, tī′bẽr (anc. Ti'beris and Thybris; It. Tevere, tĕv′ĕr-ä), a river of central Italy, rises in the Tuscan Apennines, on the slope of Monte Fumajolo at an elevation of 4160 feet (Vene del Tevere), 1 mile from the village of Le Balze, and 6 miles (direct) N. of Pieve Santo Stefano. It flows generally southward, and after a course of 245 miles enters the Mediterranean Sea, 26 miles below Rome (which city the river traverses), by two mouths, which enclose a small delta, the ancient Insula Sacra (now Isola Sacra). The main delta arm discharges through the channel known as the Fossa Trajani, at Fiumicino, while the other arm, which is frequently silted, empties a few miles farther south after passing Ostia, the ancient port of Rome, now located about 2½ miles inland. The annual advance seaward of the delta deposits is about 13 ft. It would appear that at one time the oceanic discharge of the river was at the site of the modern Ponte Galera; borings at Ostia give a depth of the fluviatile deposits of upward of 600 ft. The waters of the Tiber in Rome have been canalized, and are crossed by a considerable number of bridges. The river is navigable at certain seasons as far as the confluence of the Nera, 30 miles N. of Rome. Its principal tributaries are the Topino, the Nera (anc. Nar), and the Teverone (anc. Anio), from the E.; and the Nestore, the Chiana, and the Nepi, from the W. Its banks are not picturesque. The stream, usually sluggish, is rapid in spring, and brings down with it a colored, muddy deposit, which caused it anciently to be termed the "yellow Tiber." At Rome it is in general about 250 ft. across.

Tiberias, Palestine. See TABARIYEH, BAHR.

Tibesti, a region of the central Sahara, in the Tibbu Country, SE. of Fezzan and adjoining Borku on the SE. It is largely mountainous and attains an elevation of 8850 feet. The caravan route from Murzuk to Lake Chad passes immediately W. of it. Tibesti is a fairly fertile region and has a considerable rainfall.

Tibet, or Thibet, tib′et or tib-et′, an extensive region of Central Asia, included in the Chinese Empire, stretching from lon. 79° to 103° E., and having the great bulwark of the Himalayas on the S., and the Kuen-lun, Altin-Tag, and Nan-shan mountains on the N. It has Upper Burma, Assam, Bhutan, Nepal, and British India on the S.; Ladakh and Bultistan (Little Tibet) on the W.; Chinese Turkestan on the N.; and China proper on the E. Area, estimated at about 750,000 sq. m. It is the most elevated extensive country on the surface of the globe, and consists of a vast mountain-traversed upland or series of plains, whose general elevation in the western half is maintained at 14,000–17,000 feet, and in the E. and NE. at heights varying from about 8000 or 9000 ft. to 14,000 ft. The high surface level is not, as was formerly supposed, the culmination of a techtonic plateau, but merely that of a large number of sedimented valleys, whose deep troughs have received and retained the débris resulting from the downwash of the surrounding and traversing mountains. The major mountain-masses or ridges that rise above the interior plains, and which are not clearly linked with the mountain-walls that form the absolute boundaries, are the so-called Tibetan Central Range in the west-centre; the Dupleix and Tanla mountains in the centre; the Przevalski Range, possibly an extension of the Kuen-lun, in the N.; the Marco Polo Range towards the NE. (delimiting the Koko-nor or Tsaidam basin); and the congeries or closely-pressed southeastwardly trending ridges in the SE., through whose nearly parallel valleys the Mekong, Yang-tse-kiang, and other streams take their courses. The loftiest summits within Tibet proper would appear to be the Ulug-Mustagh, W. of Mount Reclus, in the N. (approx. lat. 36° 30′ N., lon. 87° 30′ E.), 25,300 ft.; and Aling-Gungri, a spur of the Karakorum, in the W., about 24,000 ft. The greater part of western Tibet is of a desert character, destitute of running waters, and largely or almost wholly deficient in vegetation; and some of these same characteristics belong to the centre and N., where a rigorous and inhospitable climate prevails. The southern and eastern parts are, on the other hand, plentifully watered by large and powerful streams, whose courses are ultimately directed across the mountain-walls. The sources of the Indus, Sutlej, Ganges, and Sanpo (or Brahmaputra) are in the SW. part of the table-land, in close proximity to each other; the last-named flows along the northern base of the Himalayas through 13 degrees of longitude, after which it breaks through the mountain-barrier in a series of wild gorges to gain the plains of Assam. The Yang-tse-kiang has its ultimate source near the centre of Tibet, with the Mekong River to the S. and the Hoang-ho to the NE., the last-named issuing from the lake region of the Koko-nor basin. Tibet contains hundreds of lakes, which are scattered over almost the whole of its area, the greater number being lakes of interior drainage only,—that is, without permanent outlets,—and with briny or salt waters. Among the better known of these lakes are the Tengri-nor, NW. of Lhasa, lying at an elevation of upward of 15,000 ft.; Yamdok-tso, an exquisitely beautiful and intensely-colored sheet of water SSW. of Lhasa; Manasarowar, the source of the Sutlej (15,200 ft.), and the near-by Rakas-tal; Tsaring (or Charing), the source of the Hoang-ho; and the large Koko-nor, in the NE. (about 10,000 ft.).

The climate throughout the greater part of Tibet, by reason of its great altitude and the snowy heights that surround it, is bleak and cold, but in the southern sections the summer days are mild and pleasant, with remarkably clear skies and not infrequent rains. Vegetation rapidly responds to the genial temperature of this season, and the more favored tracts, such as the valley of the Sanpo (or Brahmaputra), and the valleys that are tributary to it, as well as the basin in which Lhasa is situated, bear bountiful crops of wheat, barley, and pease, or bloom forth in vast meadows of grass, which afford pasturage to flocks of cattle, sheep, and goats, and to numerous horses and mules. Groves of poplar and walnut, and less frequently orchards of peach and apricot, diversify a by no means cheerless landscape, dotted with hamlets, monasteries, and the pleasing residences of the more favored in estate. The chief pursuits of the inhabitants are pastoral. The wild animals of the region are not very numerous, but they embrace the yak, species of deer, sheep, and goats, and perhaps even one or more species of equines most closely related to the horse. A wolf-like dog is also native of this region. The animals of draught are the yak (domesticated), camel, ox, horse, and mule.

Among the more important mineral products of the land are borax, nitre, rock salt, iron, silver, copper, gold, turquoise, and lapis-lazuli. The Tibetans manufacture woollen fabrics extensively and are skilled workers in metals. The exports include the precious metals, borax, salt, wool and woollen fabrics, metallic wares, musk, furs, etc. The traffic through Tibet is extensive, and is largely monopolized by the government, the officers of state, and the monasteries. The trade with China is conducted at Lhasa and Sin-ning, a town of the Chinese province of Kan-su (on the Wei-ho, a tributary of the Hoang-ho). The trade between Tibet and British India is considerable. The means of transport are very primitive. Goods are carried largely on the backs of yaks and sheep. Among the more important places in Tibet are Lhasa, the capital, estimated to have a population (1904–05) of 15,000–20,000, and situated at a height of 12,300 feet; Gyangze or Gyantse, about 110 miles SW. of Lhasa (12,900 ft.); Shigatse, NW. of Gyangze; Dingri, NW. of Mount Everest; and Gartok, almost in the extreme W. Tibet is the principal seat of that form of Buddhism known as Lamaism. At the head of the church are the Dalai Lama, who resides at Lhasa, and the Teshu Lama, who resides at Shigatse. The former virtually holds the primacy. The hierarchical structure is a vast one. The country is full of monasteries or lamaserais, whose inmates lead a life of celibacy. These lamaserais, some of which are great collections of lofty buildings, are seats of learning. By the side of Buddhism there is another and more ancient religion, widely diffused, which is known as the Bon creed. This religion was developed from Shamanism and has received Buddhistic infusions. Tibet is a very thinly peopled country. The population is generally estimated at 2,000,000 or 3,000,000, although by some it is supposed to be considerably larger. The Tibetans are a branch of the Mongol race. The administration is virtually in the hands of the natives, the Chinese government controlling the foreign relations of the country and maintaining small garrisons of Chinese troops. The nominal head of the government is the Dalai Lama, but the practical conduct of affairs is lodged in a regent, appointed by the Chinese government and selected from among the lamas, and in a council of ministers. In 1904 England extorted from Tibet various concessions in the matter of trade and in that of the foreign relations of the country. Chinese domination in Tibet dates only from the eighteenth century.

Tibet, Little. See BULTISTAN.

Tibi, or Tivi, te′ne, a pueblo of Albay province, Luzon, Philippine Islands, on Lagonoy Gulf, and E. of Malinao volcano. It has mineral springs of medicinal value. Pop. in 1903, 9593.

Tibur, the ancient name of TIVOLI.

Tiburon, te-BOO-rōn′ ("Shark" Island), an island in the Gulf of California. Lat. 29° N.; lon. 112° 30′ W. Length, 30 miles.

Tiburon, a post-village and resort of Marin co., Cal., on the California Northwestern R. The banking point is San Rafael. Pop. about 250.

Ticao, te-kä′o, one of the Philippine Islands, between Luzon and Masbate. It is about 28 miles long by 8 miles wide, mountainous and very fertile.

Tichau, tik′ŏw, a village of Prussia, in Silesia, 60 miles SE. of Oppeln. Pop. in 1900, 4923.

Tichigan, a post-village of Racine co., Wis. The banking point is Burlington.

Ticino, te-chee′no (anc. Tici′nus), a river of Switzerland and Italy, rises by two little head-streams on the declivity of Mount St. Gotthard and in the Nufenen Pass, flows SE. and then SW. through the canton of Ticino, traverses Lago Maggiore, and, after forming the boundary between Lombardy and Piedmont, joins the Po in Lombardy, 3½ miles SSE. of Pavia, the principal town on its banks. Total course, about 150 miles. It is navigable from Lago Maggoire. The uppermost part of its valley is called Leventina. Hannibal's career in Italy began with his victory over the Romans on the banks of this river in 218 B.C.

Ticino (Ger. and Fr. Tessin), a canton of Switzerland, in the SE., on the Italian side of the Alps, whose ranges separate it from the cantons of Uri, Grisons, and Valais. It is bounded on the S. by Lombardy and on the SW. by Piedmont. Area, 1088 sq. m. The surface is covered in great part by the so-called Alps of Ticino. On the northern border is the mass of the St. Gotthard, and the Adula mountain group extends into the NE. part. The S. extremity belongs to the plain of Lombardy. The canton is almost wholly drained by the Ticino and its tributaries. Its S. part comprises the larger portion of the Lago di Lugano, with the N. extremity of Lago Maggiore. The region presents a great diversity of climate, according to the elevation, from temperate to very cold. The products comprise all kinds of cereals, tobacco, fruit (including subtropical kinds), chestnuts, and wine. Silk-culture is a considerable industry. The forests are very extensive, but until recently have been greatly neglected. The manufactures are unimportant. The St. Gotthard railway traverses the canton. The population in 1900 was 138,243, nearly all Italians by speech and Roman Catholics. The legislative body is the Great Council, whose members are elected for a term of 4 years. There is an executive council, also elected by the people. The capital is Bellinzona. Other considerable towns are Lugano and Locarno. These places present an Italian appearance. The canton of Ticino as such has existed only a little over a century.

Tickfaw, a post-hamlet of Tangipahoa parish, La., on the Illinois Central R., about 56 miles N. by W. of New Orleans.

Tickfaw River, La., rises in St. Helena parish and flows into Lake Maurepas.

Tickhill, a town of England, co. of York, West Riding, 7 miles S. of Doncaster. Pop. in 1901, 1565.

Ticknor, a hamlet of Colquitt co., Ga.

Ticonderoga, ti'kon-dęr-o′gą, a banking post-village in Ticonderoga township (town), Essex co., N.Y., near Lake Champlain and on the outlet of Lake George, 24 miles N. of Whitehall, on the Delaware and Hudson and the Rutland Rs. It is a popular tourist-resort and has graphite-works and manufactures of paper pulp and paper-making machinery. The outlet of Lake George here falls 30 feet and affords good water-power. In the near vicinity are the ruins of old Fort Ticonderoga. (See FORT TICONDEROGA.) Pop. of the town in 1900, 5048; of the village, 1911.

Ticon'ic, a post-village of Monona co., Iowa. Pop. 100.

Ticul, te-kool′, a town of Yucatan, 30 miles S. of Mérida. It is large, interspersed with gardens, and has a fine square, with a domed church, a convent, and manufactures of earthenware, hats, etc. Near here are the extensive ruins of Uxmal. Pop. in 1900, 5587.

Tidalwave, a post-station of Whitley co., Ky.

Tien-pai, te-ĕn'pī′, a seaport of China, in the SW. part of Kwang-tung.

Tien-tsin, te-ĕn'tseen′, a city and treaty-port of China, province of Chi-li, on the Pei-ho, where the river is joined by the Hun-ho, the Hu-to-ho (Tse-ya-ho), and the Grand Canal. It is about 70 miles SE. of Peking and almost as far from the mouth of the Pei-ho, following its extremely tortuous course. Tien-tsin is the port of Peking and is connected with it by rail, as well as with Manchuria. The city, which is surrounded by a lofty wall with towers, presents a mean appearance with its great expanse of low houses. The foreign quarter, however, which is outside of the main city, is well built and provided with the appurtenances of European civilization. Tien-tsin is a great emporium of the internal trade of China and one of the leading ports of the empire. It is a great mart for salt and tea. The population is estimated at about 750,000. In 1858 China concluded treaties at Tien-tsin with Great Britain, France, Russia, and the United States; Russia obtained the cession of the Amur country. The city figured prominently in the hostilities between the foreign powers and the Chinese in 1900.

Tiermas, te-ĕR′mås, a watering-place of Spain, province and 65 miles N. of Saragossa, on the Aragón, with noted thermal springs. Pop. (commune) about 800.

Tierra Amarilla, te-ĕr'rå å-må-reel'yå, a post-village, capital of Rio Arriba co., N.Mex., 10 miles (direct) SSW. of Chama. Pop. about 150.

Tierra Austral del Espiritu Santo, te-ĕr'rå ŏws-trål' dĕl ĕs-pee're-too sån'to, an island in the Pacific Ocean, in the group of the New Hebrides. See NEW HEBRIDES.

Tierra-Bomba, te-ĕr'rå bom'bå, an island in the Caribbean Sea, off the NW. coast of Colombia, near the harbor of Cartagena.

Tierra del Fuego, te-ĕr'rå dĕl fwå'go (the "land of fire;" Port. Terra do Fogo, tĕr'rå do fo'go), a group of islands at the S. extremity of South America, between lat. 52° 40′ and 56° S., belonging in (greater) part to Chile and in part to the Argentine Republic. It is separated from the main-land by the Strait of Magellan, and its other sides are washed by the Atlantic Ocean on the E., the Pacific on the W., and the Southern (Antarctic) Ocean on the S. Besides numberless small islands, it consists of one very large island, East Tierra del Fuego, or King Charles South Land, measuring from E. to W., near its S. shore, about 270 miles, and of 5 very considerable smaller islands,—Navarín and Hoste on the S., separated from East Tierra del Fuego by Beagle Channel, and Clarence, Santa Inez, and Desolación (Desolation) on the W. The extreme points of the island-group are Cape Pillar in the NW. (on Desolación), Catherine Point (on East Tierra del Fuego) in the NE., Cape St. John (San Juan) in the E. (on Staten Island), and Cape Horn in the S. (on Horn Island). All of the islands are deeply penetrated by arms of the sea, and are composed of mountains which are either covered with perpetual ice and snow or are clothed with stunted forests, chiefly of evergreen beech. The loftiest summits appear to be the singularly imposing and double-peaked Mount Sarmiento (6910 feet) and Mount Darwin (about 6800 feet). Although they are called "land of fire," there are no volcanoes in the islands. The main system of the Andes is carried through the western part of the group, which is seemingly undergoing disintegration, whereas the Patagonian plains are continued into East Tierra del Fuego. The climate, though disagreeable, is not particularly rigorous, the mean January (summer) temperature being about 52½° and the July (winter) temperature 31°, and there is a fairly abundant rainfall. Some of the hardier cereals come to maturity, and there is considerable land under cultivation. Gold is found in placers and there is also some lignite. The plant- and animal-life is on the whole limited and bears testimony to the long-continued separation of the islands from the main-land. The true Fuegians, or aboriginal inhabitants, who somewhat resemble the Patagonians, do not at this time, probably, exceed 1000 in number. The civilized population is almost entirely centred in Argentine Tierra del Fuego,—the territory lying E. of a line connecting the entrance of Magellan Strait with the middle of Beagle Channel,—and in 1900 numbered 2159. The Chilean section forms the territory of Magallanes, with the seat of government at Punta Arenas, on the main-land. The islands were discovered by Magellan in 1520.

Tiflis, tif'lis', a government of the Russian Empire, in Transcaucasia, bounded NE. by the crest of the Caucasus and occupying the central part of the former kingdom of Georgia. Area, about 17,000 sq. m. It is a region of mountains and valleys. The principal river is the Kur. The forests cover a large area. In addition to the regular agricultural crops the region produces wine, fruits, and silk. Large numbers of cattle, sheep, and goats are reared. The inhabitants are mainly Georgians and Armenians, only about 5 per cent. being Russians. Capital, Tiflis. Pop. in 1897, 1,040,943.

Tiflis, the capital of the Russian government of Tiflis, Transcaucasia, and the administrative seat of the general government of the Caucasus, formerly capital of Georgia, situated on both banks of the river Kur, about 275 miles (direct) WNW. of Baku. Lat. 41° 42′ N.; lon. 44° 48′ E. It is connected by rail with Baku and with the ports of Batum and Poti on the Black Sea. The city is picturesquely situated in the basin-like valley at the southern foot of the Caucasus. The streets rise in terraces one above another, and vineyards and orchards on the slopes lend attraction to the appearance of the place. Until recently Tiflis was an oriental town of little pretensions, but under Russian rule, which began with the opening of the nineteenth century, it has blossomed out into a great modern city, while still preserving its ancient quarters. It has hotels and fine shops, theatres (Russian, Armenian, and Georgian), banks, newspapers in various languages, tramways, and a fire department. The principal objects of architectural interest are the churches, which are among the most ancient to be found anywhere. Prominent among them is the cathedral of Zion, once the seat of the Catholicus of Georgia. There are a great number of Greek and Armenian churches and one or two mosques survive. Among the attractions of Tiflis are the public gardens and the botanical garden. The city has numerous schools, a conservatory of music, a Caucasian museum, a railroad institute, a sericultural station, and a physical observatory. There are extensive manufactures of leather and tobacco, and cotton-spinning and brewing are carried on. Tiflis is an important trading centre. The city has hot sulphur springs. The population rose from about 25,000 in 1830 to 89,551 in 1885, and to 160,645 in 1897. Nearly two-fifths of the inhabitants are Armenians, and the Russians and Georgians each comprise about one-fourth. A number of nationalities are represented in the remainder.

Tigré, tee'grå', one of the three main divisions of Abyssinia, formerly an independent kingdom, comprising the northeastern part of the country. It has Amhara on the SW., Eritrea on the N., and the Danakil country on the E. It is a region of elevated plateaus and lofty mountains. It contains the towns of Adowa and Axum. The Tigré language is essentially a Semitic tongue, akin to the Amharic.

Tigris, a river of Asiatic Turkey, rises in two or more branches in the border-mountains of Armenia and Kurdistan, near Kharput and Bitlis (SW. of Lake Van), flows generally southeastward,—passing Diarbekr (on the NW. head-stream), Mosul, Tekrit, and Bagdad,—and unites at Korna (about 90 miles NW. of the Persian Gulf) with the Euphrates to form the Shat-el-Arab. The main portion of the region between the Tigris and the Euphrates, called Al-Jezireh, is the ancient Mesopotamia. The principal affluents of the Tigris are the Great and Little Zab and the Diala (Dyala), all coming from the E. The Tigris is a rapid stream and, although available for boats in one form or another for most of its course, does not present the full advantages of open navigation. Steamers ascend the river regularly to Bagdad, and smaller vessels to Mosul. Between Mosul and Diarbekr the river-service is almost entirely one of down-stream and executed by an old and primitive system of rafting. The banks of the river in the upper part of its course are thinly peopled; but the pasture-grounds are rich and well suited for the nomadic tribes which visit them. The river attains its greatest height between the middle and the end of May, and after this time it falls till the middle of June. It brings down vast quantities of deposit. In its lower course it unites by means of a number of semi-permanent natural-ways (or "canals") with the Euphrates. The region traversed by the Tigris is one of great historic interest, and on its banks are the ruins of ancient Nineveh (opposite Mosul), Seleucia, and Ctesiphon. Length, about 1150 miles.

Timor, te-mōr′, an island of the Malay Archipelago, lying SE. of Ombay (Allor), from which it is separated by Ombay Passage. It is the largest and most important of the Lesser Sunda Islands, and belongs politically to the Netherlands (SW. half) and Portugal (NE.). Lat. of SW. point about 10° 24′ S.; lon. 123° 32′ E. Length, 275 miles. Area, about 12,350 sq. m. The island is traversed from SW. to NE. by one or more ranges of ancient mountains, with which are associated a number of volcanic cones. The loftiest summit appears to be Gunung-Alas, on the SE. coast, which has an altitude estimated at 11,800 (12,250?) feet. The surface is very rugged, wooded in part, and barren or sterile elsewhere. In its faunal and floral characteristics the island appears to be intermediate between the Malasian and Australian regions. Among the vegetable products are the bamboo, maize, toddy-palm, cotton, tobacco, sweet potato, indigo, bread-fruit, pineapple, cocoanut, sago, mango, lemon, papaw, sandal-wood, etc. The domestic animals are the buffalo, ox, horse, sheep, pig, and various fowls. Near the river-mouths crocodiles abound, on the shores turtles are found, and venomous serpents are numerous. Iron, copper, and gold seem to be fairly abundant and there exist also deposits of coal and petroleum. Agriculture is little attended to, but some wheat, maize, rice, potatoes, and coffee are exported. The inhabitants of Timor are, in the main, a mixed race, Malay, Polynesian, and Papuan blood being represented. Some of the tribes are still head-hunters. The island is divided into a large number of native kingdoms. The Dutch possessions form part of the residency of Timor (with the eastern part of Flores, the Solor and Allor groups, the islands of Savu, Rotti, and Sumba). The capital is Kupang, on the SW. coast. The capital of Portuguese Timor and the chief port of the island is Dilli. Population of the island estimated at 400,000.

Titicaca (te-te-kå′kå), Lake, the largest lake of South America, forms part of the boundary between Peru and Bolivia, in the centre of a lofty valley, between the main Andean chain and the Cordillera Real. It measures about 130 miles in length, with a greatest width of 35 miles. Area, estimated at about 3200 sq. m. Height above sea-level, 12,500 feet; greatest depth, about 700 feet. It is of very irregular shape, having numerous large bays enclosed by projecting peninsulas. The plateau-valley occupied in part by Lake Titicaca is of vast extent, and is seemingly the floor of an ancient lake whose waters stood hundreds of feet above the present water-surface and discharged eastward into some tributary of the Amazon. Lake Titicaca contains several islands, of which the largest bears its own name and lies near the SW. shore. The chief feeders of the lake are the Asangaro and Lagunillas, both of which enter it on its N. shore. The only outlet now is the Desaguadero, which issues from its S. extremity and continues its course SE. through the great alpine valley between the cordilleras to Lake Aullagas. On its W. shore are the towns of Puno (connected by rail with Mollendo, on the Pacific coast), Julí, and Chucuito. The lake is navigated by small steamboats. On its shores are many ruins, and it is celebrated in Peruvian history as the spot where Manco Capac, the first Inca of the last Peruvian dynasty, miraculously appeared.

Tobol, to-bol', a river of Siberia, rises in the S. part of the Ural Mountains and, after a NE. course of about 750 miles, joins the Irtish near Tobolsk. The chief affluents are the Ui, Miyas, Tura, and Tavda, all from the W.; from the influx of the Ui downward it is navigable throughout three-fourths of its course.

Tobolsk, to-bolsk', the westernmost government of Siberia, extending to the Arctic Ocean and lying almost wholly between lat. 55° and 73° N. and lon. 60° and 82° 30' E., having W. the Ural mountains and E. the governments of Tomsk and Yeniseisk, and S. Akmolinsk and Semipalatinsk. Area, 539,659 sq. m. Pop. in 1897, 1,438,484. The surface is mountainous in the NW., where it abuts upon the Ural chain; elsewhere mostly level. It is watered by the Ob and its tributary waters, the Irtish, Ishim, Tobol, Tavda, etc. N. of lat. 65° or 66° the country is in greater part tundra or frozen moorland. A wide forest-region of firs and birch extends between lat. 65° and 58° N., S. of which is the most productive and populous portion of the government, having a rich and fertile soil. Rye, barley, wheat, oats, and buckwheat are produced and, with other necessaries, are conveyed down the Ob and other rivers to the N. A partially desert steppe region succeeds to this in the farther south, and in the extreme SE. is the Baraba morass country, which is elevated only about 300 feet above the sea. Among the mineral resources of the Ural district are iron, copper, gold, silver, and platinum. There is considerable manufacturing in the government, chiefly of paper, cloth, leather, glass-ware, and spirits. The population is most thickly collected between Omsk (in Akmolinsk, just beyond the frontier) and Tobolsk, in which tract is a succession of Tartar, Kirghiz, and Russian villages. The principal towns are Tobolsk (the capital), Tyumen, Yalutorovsk, Kurgan, Tara, Turinsk, Demiansk, Surgut, Berezov, and Obdorsk, the last-named just beyond the Arctic Circle. The Transsiberian railway crosses the SW. corner of the government.

Tobolsk, the capital of West Siberia and of the government of Tobolsk, at the junction of the Irtish and Tobol rivers, in lat. 58° 12' N., lon. 68° 16' E. Pop. in 1897, 20,427. The city proper stands on the flat summit of a hill, and presents an attractive external appearance, with its cupolated cathedral and other churches. The city contains a prison, a gymnasium and seminary, a city museum, and a monument to Yermak, the founder of Russian dominion in Siberia. The climate is extremely severe in winter. Tobolsk is to some extent engaged in boat-building, fishing, furdressing, and other industries, but its importance has declined since the opening of the Transsiberian railway, which passes nearly 200 miles S. of its site. It was founded in 1587.

Tokyo, or Tokio, to'ke-o (prior to 1868 called Yedo, Yeddo, Jeddo, yed'do), the capital of the Japanese Empire, is situated in the E. part of Hondo, the main island, on the Bay of Tokyo (or Yedo), and on both sides of the Sumida River (Sumidagawa). The city occupies a very large area, a considerable portion of which is not built over or is in the form of parks and gardens, and constitutes, with its immediate surroundings, the district of Tokyo-fu. Lat. of observatory, 35° 39′ 17″ N.; lon. 139° 44′ 30″ E. It is traversed by a considerable number of canals, which are bridged at frequent intervals. Of the 15 or more districts of the city, only two—Honjo, which contains the famous Eko-in temple, and Fukagawa (Fukiage)—are located on the E. side of the Sumida. Tokyo is distinctively divided into 3 sections,—(1) Siro, the imperial citadel, occupying nearly the geographic centre of the city; (2) Soto-Siro, "outside the citadel," a fairly large district surrounding the first; and (3) Midzi, "the outer parts." The Midzi were formerly taken up largely by the residences of the daimios, but these have given place to government buildings, colleges, barracks, foundries, steam mills and factories, etc. The three sections here indicated were formerly enclosed or defended by walls and moats, but these have in greater part been removed. Outside of these districts there are miles of brick, stone, adobe, and wooden buildings, mostly in European styles of construction, the growth of the few years since Tokyo became the seat of government and the place of sojourn of the ministers of foreign countries. The streets of the modern Tokyo are regular, fairly wide, and clean, and some of them are traversed by tramways. Tokyo is connected by railway and telegraph with Yokohama and other principal commercial cities. Apart from the palace and other government buildings, a number of temples and mortuary shrines, there are few noteworthy edifices in the city. The imperial university (or University of Tokyo) is the most important educational institution of the empire, has full faculties, and ranks with the leading universities of the western world. It was attended in 1903–04 by 3771 students. Tokyo is the seat of geological, geographical, seismological, astronomical, meteorological, and statistical societies, of national trigonometric, hydrographic, and geological surveys, and of the Asiatic Society of Japan. A large number of books and periodicals are published here. The foreign trade of Tokyo is very limited, on account of the shallowness of the water in the bay and river, which prevents large vessels from approaching within about 5 miles; but the manufacturing industries are being developed and there are many considerable establishments employing steam and modern machinery of the most approved kinds. The population some years before the city was opened to foreigners was stated to be about 1,500,000; but many of the natives left the city in 1869 and the three or four succeeding years, so that in 1872 a careful enumeration showed but 779,361. Pop. by the census of 1884, 902,837; in 1891, 1,155,290; in 1903 (Jan. 1), 1,839,788 (city proper).

Toledo (Sp. pron. to-lå'do; anc. Toletum), a city of Spain, capital of the province of Toledo, on the Tagus, 41 miles SSW. of Madrid. Lat. 39° 52′ N.; lon. 4° 49′ W. It is strikingly situated on a bold eminence around whose base the Tagus flows in a deep ravine. The climate is very cold in winter and correspondingly hot in summer. With its lofty walls, its many towers, its old gates, its maze of narrow, winding streets, the gloomy exterior of its houses, and its predominant Moorish architecture, Toledo wears a mediæval and singularly impressive aspect. The famous cathedral, the principal building of the city, early-Gothic in its general style, has a wealth of chapels, comprising the lavishly decorated Capilla Mayor, containing many monuments and superb choir-stalls; the beautiful Sala la Capitulár; the Capilla de San Ildefonso; the Capilla de Santiago, with Gothic tombs of Carrara marble; and the Capilla de Reyes Nuevos, a rich treasury of art. Other noteworthy features are the church of Santo Tomé, originally a mosque, rebuilt in Gothic style in the fourteenth century, with a beautiful tower; the fine church of San Juan de los Reyes, with an adjoining convent, housing the provincial museum, and neighboring cloisters which are among the most beautiful specimens of Gothic art in Spain; the mediæval synagogue of El Tránsito; the churches of Santo Domingo el Antiguo and El Cristo de la Vega; the magnificent Hospital de Santa Cruz, in the form of a Maltese cross, with a beautiful portal; the enormous Hospital de San Juan Bautista; the city-hall, with two towers and a fine classic façade; a handsome theatre; the archiepiscopal palace, containing the provincial museum; the large government weapon-factory; the alcázar, standing on the highest ground in the city; the mediæval five-arched bridge of San Martin, spanning the deep gorge of the Tagus; the imposing Moorish bridge of Alcántara; and the Puerta del Sol, a very ancient gate. Toledo is celebrated for the manufacture of arms; its highly-tempered blades have been famous from ancient times. Among other manufactures are ecclesiastical vestments. Its marchpane is known throughout Spain. Toledo is the seat of an archbishop, who bears the title of primate of all Spain. Pop. in 1900, 23,375.

Toledo was the capital of the realm of the Visigoths in Spain, which was destroyed by the Arabs early in the eighth century. Under the Visigoths it rose to be a great ecclesiastical centre. It was a flourishing city and a seat of learning under the caliphs of Cordova and was the capital of a short-lived Mohammedan kingdom in the eleventh century. In 1085 Alfonso the Valiant of Leon and Castile took the city after a memorable siege. It was long the capital of the Castilian realm.

It presents an attractive appearance, the houses in the residential quarters standing apart in well-kept gardens. The city has a fine harbor, with a deep waterway (the "Straight Channel"), extending to the lake, and with many miles of dockage and warehousing. It has direct communication with the interior by the Miami and Erie Canal, and is the centre of a vast net-work of railroads which make use of the terminals for shipping. Toledo is a natural outlet for much of the grain and lumber products of the north-central section of the Union, likewise for coal and iron, and it is a receiving point for natural gas from the fields of which it is a centre. The city has some notable public buildings, as the public library, county court-house, Soldiers' Memorial, etc., and is the seat of Toledo Medical College and St. John's College, and possesses a zoological garden (in Walbridge Park). The manufacturing industries are very varied and conducted on an extensive scale. They include the manufacture of malleable iron and foundry products, steel-castings, boilers and steam-engines, stoves and ranges, agricultural implements, bicycles and automobiles, wagons and carriages, plate- and cut-glass, lumber, tobacco, flour, spices, malted liquors, articles of apparel, etc. The city is also largely engaged in boat-building and the construction of large vessels of the ocean class. Toledo was incorporated in 1837, the two villages of Fort Lawrence and Vistula, with a total population of less than 1000, being united to form a new city. Pop. in 1870, 31,584; in 1880, 50,137; in 1890, 81,434; in 1900, 131,822.

Tonga (tong'gȧ) or Friendly Islands, a group in the South Pacific Ocean, lying SE. of the Fiji Islands and between lat. 18° and 23° S. The islands are, perhaps, 150 or more in number, of which hardly a fifth are inhabited, and are disposed in two parallel chains, running NE. and SW. The W. chain (the smaller) is volcanic, with some active and extinct cones (Tofoa, Late, Lette, and Kao); the E. chain is chiefly of coral formation, low and exceedingly fertile, and is covered with a rich vegetation. It exports fruits, coffee, arrow-root, fungus, and copra. The climate is humid but salubrious; hurricanes are frequent. The inhabitants are fair Polynesians, somewhat like the Samoans, and are Christianized. The islands were discovered by Tasman in 1643, but received their collective name from Cook in 1777. They have been under British protection since 1899, although still possessing a native ruler or king. The largest of the islands is Tongatabu, on which is Nukualofa, the capital. Other islands are Annamuko, Kotu, Hapai, Vavau, Tofoa, Eoa, etc. Area, 390 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 20,677.

Tong`king', or Tonquin, ton`kin', a possession of France in the NE. part of French Indo-China, bounded on the N. by the Chinese provinces of Kwang-si and Yun-nan, on the W. by Laos, on the S. by Annam, and on the E. by the Gulf of Tongking. The western boundary is not precisely determined. Area, between 40,000 and 50,000 sq. m. Prior to 1883–85, when a French protectorate over the region was established, it constituted the northernmost province or viceroyalty of the kingdom of Annam. Tongking extends from the parallel of 20° N. lat. nearly to the Tropic of Cancer and lies in great part in the drainage-basin of the Song-ka or Red River. It is on the whole of a mountainous character, continuing the general features of China southward, and rises in a number of summits to 5000 and 6000 feet elevation or more. On the gulf border it falls to a low-lying flat, which at periods of heavy rainfall is frequently flooded by the river-waters to a depth of several feet. The soil is exceedingly fertile and the surface, excepting on the mountains, where some virgin forest (yielding teak and other valuable woods) still remains, is in great part under cultivation. Rice is the most important agricultural product, and the rice-plantations occupy large areas in the Song-ka delta-region. Sugar, tobacco, coffee, the poppy, hemp, ramie, and cotton are also cultivated, together with the betel-palm and silk-mulberry. The mineral resources are gold (found in many of the river-beds), silver (at Ngan-son), copper, quicksilver, iron, and coal, the last-named being mined (chiefly at Hon-gai) to an extent of 150,000–200,000 tons or more annually. The principal European industries of Tongking are concentrated at Ha-noi and Hai-phong (the chief port), where large cotton-, silk- and other mills, a match-factory, breweries and distilleries, foundries, etc., have been established. The silk product amounts in some years to 750,000 kilogrammes. Tongking has on the whole a tropical climate, but there is a well-accentuated winter or "cold" period, when the temperature descends to nearly 40°. The rainfall is very heavy. The population of Tongking is estimated to number from eight to ten millions. The great bulk of the inhabitants are Annamese. In the mountains dwell the Muongs. The Europeans number only a few thousand. Capital, Ha-noi, which is also the capital of French Indo-China.

About a quarter of a century ago the incursions of the Black Flags, a predatory Chinese soldiery who infested the delta of the Song-ka, which France was eager to secure for its commerce, afforded that state a coveted pretext for bringing Tongking within the sphere of its authority. In 1882 the French seized the citadel of Ha-noi. War ensued between France and Annam, and France became involved in a struggle with China, which claimed suzerainty over Annam. After much severe fighting, French dominion in Tongking was established in 1885.

Toul, tool (anc. Tullum Leucorum), a town of France, capital of an arrondissement in the department of Meurthe-et-Moselle, and a fortress of the first class, 14 miles W. of Nancy. The principal edifices are the former cathedral of St. Étienne, gracefully proportioned, with a beautiful W. front, fine towers, and handsome cloisters; the Gothic church of St. Gengoult, with fine cloisters in the Flamboyant style of the sixteenth century; and the imposing town-hall, formerly the bishop's palace. The town has manufactures of pottery, lace, etc. Toul was from very early times the seat of a bishop. In the latter part of the Middle Ages and at the time of the Reformation it was a free city of the German Empire. In 1552 the city and the territory of the bishopric were seized by Henry II. of France. The episcopal see was abolished in 1790. On Sept. 23, 1870, after a siege of nearly six weeks, Toul surrendered to the Germans. Pop. in 1901, 8633 (commune, 12,287).

Toulon, too‘lôn′ (anc. Telo Martius), a seaport of France, capital of an arrondissement in the department of Var, situated on a fine bay of the Mediterranean Sea, 30 miles SE. of Marseilles. It is a fortress of the first class, and after Brest the most important naval station of France. It consists of an old town with narrow, crooked streets, and the new town with handsome avenues, numerous public squares, and modern buildings. The principal open places are the Place d'Armes and the Place de la Liberté. The latter is connected by the Boulevard Strasbourg with the Jardin de la Ville, a beautiful promenade. Among the objects of interest are the mediæval church of Ste. Marie Majeure, in the Romanesque style; the town-hall, the handsome modern Renaissance Musée-Bibliothèque, the vast marine hospital, the arsenal, which covers 660 acres, and the large theatre. The harbor, which is spacious and safe, has five main basins. Toulon was made a strong fortress in the reign of Louis XIV. In 1707, in the War of the Spanish Succession, it withstood an attack by the allies. In Aug., 1793, it was delivered by the royalists into the hands of the British. In December of the same year the French retook it. The part played by Bonaparte at this siege as commander of the French artillery first raised him into eminence. Pop. in 1901, 78,833 (commune, 101,602).

Toulouse, too‘looz′ (anc. Tolosa), a city of France, capital of the department of Haute-Garonne and formerly of the province of Languedoc, situated in a fertile valley, on the right bank of the river Garonne, 130 miles SE. of Bordeaux. Lat. of observatory, 43° 36′ 45″ N.; lon. 1° 27′ 30″ E. Three bridges, one a sixteenth-century stone structure of 7 arches, connect it with the suburb of Saint-Cyprien, on the opposite bank of the river. Toulouse has for the most part narrow, ill-paved streets and poorly built districts, but it is intersected by fine avenues. The principal edifices are the church of St. Sernin, one of the finest specimens of Romanesque architecture, begun in the eleventh century and restored by Viollet-le-Duc; the church of La Dalbade, with a fine square tower and a beautiful Renaissance portal; the cathedral of St. Étienne, a composite of different styles; the "Capitole" or town-hall, the seat of the Académie des Jeux Floraux ("Floral Games"), one of the oldest literary institutions of Europe; the donjon, restored by Viollet-le-Duc, containing the municipal archives; the Palais de Justice, and the handsome Hôtel Lasbordes. The educational institutions of the city comprise the university, founded in the thirteenth century, with about 2000 students; a veterinary college, academies of sciences and of inscriptions and belles-lettres, and the Musée des Beaux-Arts, with a fine collection of antiquities and pictures. Toulouse, owing to its position in the centre of southern France, at the junction of the Canal du Midi and the Canal Latéral, is an important commercial and industrial town. Much of the transit trade to Spain passes through it. It has a large national powder-factory, a national tobacco-factory, a cannon-foundry, and manufactures of paper, agricultural machines, leather and saddlery, stained-glass, carriages, furniture, etc. The town is the seat of the archbishop of Toulouse and Narbonne. Pop. in 1901, 127,866 (commune, 149,841).

Toulouse rose into importance before the beginning of Roman dominion in Gaul. It was the capital of the kingdom of the Visigoths for nearly a century from about A.D. 419. Later it was the residence of the dukes of Aquitaine under the Merovingian kings. For several centuries it was the capital of the County of Toulouse, which, gradually emerging from its position of dependence on the French crown, rose to be a large and powerful principality, whose dominions comprised Languedoc and parts of Guienne and Provence. The county was united with the French crown in 1271. In 1814 Soult made an unsuccessful stand against Wellington at Toulouse.

Tours, toor (anc. Cæsarodunum, afterwards Turones), a city of France, capital of the department of Indre-et-Loire and formerly of Touraine, situated on the left bank of the Loire and near the right bank of the Cher, 70 miles SW. of Orleans. It is connected with the suburb of Saint-Symphorien, on the opposite bank of the Loire, by a fine fifteen-arched stone bridge. The mild and equable climate of the town has rendered it a favorite resort of foreigners, especially of the English. The principal features of Tours are the superb Gothic cathedral, begun in the twelfth century and finished in the sixteenth, with a richly ornamented façade, magnificent stained-glass windows, and two imposing towers; the detached towers of St. Martin and Charlemagne, the only remains of the famous basilica of St. Martin, demolished in 1802; the archiepiscopal palace, with archæological, palæontological, and art collections; the museum, the theatre, and the statue of Balzac, a native of Tours, by Fournier. In the immediate vicinity of the town is the ruined château of Plessis-lès-Tours, the residence of Louis XI. Tours has an art school, the Collège de St. Louis de Gonzaga, a preparatory school of medicine and pharmacy, and a library of 125,000 volumes. The industries comprise the manufacture of articles of iron and steel, leather, chemicals, silk, woollens, stained-glass, pottery, etc. A famous book-printing establishment is located here. Tours derived its name from the Gallic tribe of the Turones. In very early times it became the seat of a bishop and later of an archbishop. The battle in which Charles Martel defeated the invading Saracens in 732, often known as the battle of Tours, was fought between Tours and Poitiers. The city figured as the seat of the Government of National Defence in the autumn of 1870. At the beginning of 1871 it was in the hands of the Germans. Pop. in 1901, 58,409 (commune, 64,695).

Transalai, a mountain-mass of Central Asia, properly a SW. extension of the Tian-Shan, and forming a northeastern bulwark to the Pamir. The Kizil-Su separates it on the N. from the Alai Mountains. Mount Kauffmann, its loftiest summit, has an altitude of 23,000–25,000 feet.

Transbaikalia, trans\bī-kå'le-ą (Russ. Zabaikalskaiya, zå-bī-kåls'kī-yå), a region (province) in the western part of the general-government of the Amur, in East Siberia, having Lake Baikal on the W. and Mongolia and Manchuria (from the latter of which it is separated by the Argun River) on the S. and E. Area, about 240,000 sq. m. The region is traversed by the Yablonoi Mountains, rising to nearly 8000 feet, and a number of minor ranges, and is watered by the Shilka, Vitim, Selenga (flowing into Lake Baikal) and other streams. The climate is severe, but the summer cereals (wheat, rye, barley), potatoes, flax, and tobacco are cultivated in the southern sections and in the more protected valleys. Camels breed in some parts, and even the tiger is occasionally met with. Capital, Tchita. Transbaikalia is traversed by the Transsiberian railway. Pop. in 1897, 664,071 (Russians, Tunguses, and Buriats).

Transcaspian Territory, a region of Asiatic Russia, bounded W. by the Caspian Sea, N. by Uralsk, E. by the Sea of Aral, Khiva, and Bokhara, and SE. and S. by Afghanistan and Persia. Area, about 215,000 sq. m. The region is largely one of inhospitable steppes and deserts,—the Ust-Urt in the northern section and the Kara-Kum in the southern, with scarcely any permanent water-courses. Lofty mountains, the Kopet-Dagh, extend along the Persian frontier. In the SE. part is the oasis of Merv. There is but little cultivation, and the climate has both summer and winter extremes. The region is traversed by the Central Asiatic railway. Capital, Askabad. Pop. in 1897, 372,193. The majority of the inhabitants are Turkomans.

Transcaucasia, trans-kaw-kā'she-ą, the southern half of the Russian general-government of the Caucasus, lying mainly on the S. side of the crest of the Caucasus range. It comprises the governments or provinces of Baku, Daghestan, Erivan, Kars, Kutais, Tiflis, and Yelizavetpol and the Black Sea Territory. Daghestan and part of Baku are situated on the N. side of the Caucasus.

Transkei, trans-kī′, a division on the E. coast of Cape Colony, Africa, between the Kei River (on the S.) and Tembuland, and bordering E. on the Indian Ocean. Area, 2552 sq. m. The interior is elevated (rising to about 9800 feet). It is well watered and exceedingly fertile, with dense forests and a vigorous vegetation. Many cattle and sheep are raised. There are deposits of copper and coal. Pop. in 1904, 177,647, of whom 1704 were whites.

Transleithania, trans-lī-thā′ne-ạ, a designation of the Hungarian half (the bulk of the eastern part) of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy,—the Austrian half being distinguished as Cisleithania, the little river Leitha forming a part of the dividing-line between them. Transleithania comprises Hungary proper (with Transylvania), Croatia-Slavonia, and Fiume. The capital is Budapest. The head of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy, as ruler of Transleithania, bears the title of King of Hungary.

Transoxiana. See BOKHARA.

Transpadane Republic, a state formed in Italy by Napoleon in 1796 of part of Lombardy and Venetia. In 1797 it was incorporated with the Cisalpine Republic.

Transvaal (trans-vål′) Colony, a British possession in southern Africa, adjoining Portuguese East Africa on the E. and having Natal and the Orange River Colony on the S. The Limpopo River separates it from Rhodesia and the Bechuanaland Protectorate on the N. and NW., while the Vaal River constitutes the greater part of the southern boundary. Area, about 108,000 sq. m. The districts of Utrecht and Vryheid and part of the district of Wakkerstroom, which were included in the Transvaal Republic, were transferred to Natal in Jan., 1903. The greater part of the Transvaal region is a fairly lofty plateau or tableland, which in the S. and E. lies at elevations of from 4000 to 6000 feet and in the northern section between 1500 and 4000 ft. The Drakenberg (Kwathlamba) range, rising in the Mauchberg to upward of 8700 ft., traverses the eastern section in a N. and S. direction and the Lebombo Mountains form the boundary with Portuguese East Africa. The famous Witwatersrand (range), rising to about 6000 ft., is the water-parting in the W. between the Limpopo and the Vaal systems of waters. Other mountain-ranges or elevations are the Magaliesberg and Witfonteinberg. The extreme SW. of the colony is occupied by a vast and extremely monotonous flat. The region is well watered by the Limpopo and Vaal and their tributaries (the largest of which is the Olifant's, tributary to the Limpopo) and, in the E., by the Komati, Sabi, and Usutu. In general the Transvaal enjoys a fairly healthy climate, which is, however, marked by great summer heat (especially in the month of January) and heavy precipitation, and malarial conditions are by no means wanting during the rainy season. The winter months are invigorating and bracing. At Pretoria, at an elevation of 4470 ft., the mean maximum temperature during the three summer months is about 89°, and the mean minimum for the three winter months, about 42°; the rainfall is about 26 inches. Among the more distinctive types of the native vegetation are the numerous forms of acacia and the eucalyptus. The region is well suited to agricultural and stock-raising pursuits, most of the European grains and vegetables thriving well. Before the Anglo-Boer war vast herds of cattle and other stock were pastured on the veldts. The live-stock in the colony in 1903 was estimated at: cattle, 200,000; sheep, 200,000; horses, 50,000; and pigs, 1000. The great wealth of the region is in its mineral resources, which comprise gold, diamonds, coal, copper, iron, and tin. Comparatively little attention is paid to mining except for gold, diamonds, and coal. The chief gold centres are the Witwatersrand (one of the richest gold areas in the world, with Johannesburg as the main mining camp or centre) and Barberton. The product from the various mines during the period of 1884–98 was valued at about $350,000,000. In the year 1903 it amounted to 2,972,897 fine ounces and in 1904 to 2,434,330 fine ounces. The number of persons working in the mines at the close of 1903 was 86,324 (12,702 whites). Nearly all the diamonds obtained in the colony are from the Pretoria district; the value of the product in 1903 was about $1,200,000. Barberton, Middleburg, and Pietersburg districts furnish most of the coal that is mined. There are about 1000 miles of railway in operation.

The colony is administered by a governor, assisted by a lieutenant-governor and an executive council. There is a legislative council, consisting in part of official and in part of elected members. Pop. in 1904, 1,268,716, of whom 299,327 were whites. Capital, Pretoria. The largest town is Johannesburg, with a population of 158,000.

History.—In 1848–52 the Boers (descendants of the Dutch settlers in South Africa), having migrated from Cape Colony on account of their unwillingness to endure British rule, founded the Orange Free State and the Transvaal (South African) Republic. England recognized the two republics. In 1877 the British, who had come to the assistance of the Transvaal Republic, which was hard pressed by the Kaffirs, annexed it to their dominions. In 1880 the Boers rose in arms. The disaster to the British at Majuba Hill in 1881 was followed by the recognition of the autonomy of the Transvaal Republic. A few years later the discovery of the gold treasures of the Witwatersrand inaugurated a great influx of immigrants. They came in such numbers that the foreign population before very long outnumbered the Boers. The rise of Johannesburg was a parallel to that of San Francisco. The Boers refused to admit the new-comers, or Uitlanders, as they were called, to a share in the government, fearing lest their numerical preponderance would mean the speedy extinction of the Boer Republic as such. In 1895–96 occurred the Jameson raid, which was to be the beginning of an Uitlander uprising, to be followed by British annexation. It proved abortive. In 1899 England intervened actively in behalf of the Uitlanders. President Kruger was compelled to make far-reaching concessions, but England made further demands, claiming suzerainty over the Transvaal Republic. The Boers finally determined to take up arms and, joined by their brethren in the Orange Free State, they threw themselves upon the British with extraordinary energy. At the close of 1899 and in the early part of 1900 they achieved a succession of victories, but they finally succumbed to vastly superior numbers, not, however, until they had shown themselves to be a nation of heroes. In June, 1900, Lord Roberts entered Pretoria. Both Boer republics were annexed to the British Empire. The Transvaal Republic became the Transvaal Colony. The guerrilla warfare continued till 1902.

Transylvania, tran-sil-vā′ne-ạ (L. "the country beyond the forest"; Ger. Siebenbürgen, zee'bẹn-bürg'ẹn, the "seven castles"; Hun. Erdély, ĕr'dāl', "forest-land"), a former principality attached to the Hungarian crown, since 1867 an integral part of the Hungarian kingdom. It is bounded on the N. and W. by Hungary proper, on the S. and E. by Rumania, from which it is separated by the Carpathian Mountains, and on the NE. by Bukowina. It is situated between the parallels of 45° and 48° N. lat. Area, about 22,000 sq. m. Transylvania is a picturesque region of high mountains and valleys, the Carpathians curving round it like a great wall and overspreading it with their ramifications. The portion of the range which extends E. and W. along the southern border is known as the Transylvanian Alps. The highest summits here exceed 8000 feet in elevation. The greater part of the region belongs to the basin of the Theiss, being drained by the Szamos, Maros, and Körös rivers. The southeastern portion is drained by the Aluta River, which breaks through the Transylvanian Alps in the Red Tower Pass and then courses over the Wallachian plain to the Danube. The climate is temperate and healthful, but in the higher regions the winter is severe. The soil is generally very fertile. The forests which clothe the mountains comprise nearly two-fifths of the total area. More than one-fourth is agricultural land, and the bulk of the remainder is nearly evenly divided between natural pastures and meadows. Bountiful crops of rye, wheat, oats, and maize are produced, as well as of potatoes. Among other farm products are pulse and tobacco. The orchards yield a variety of fruits, including apricots and peaches, and the product of the vineyards is highly prized. Transylvania is rich in live-stock, including cattle, horses of fine breed, long- and short-tailed sheep, and swine. The buffalo is not an uncommon sight on the farms in some districts. Bee-keeping is an important industry. The forests consist mainly of coniferous trees, beeches, and oaks, and yield valuable timber. They harbor large numbers of game, including the brown bear, wolf, and wild boar. Transylvania is rich in minerals, which include salt, gold, silver, iron, lead, copper, coal, and lignite. It comprises part of the vast deposit of salt which crops out over a large extent of the Carpathians. Manufactures are not extensively developed.

The population of Transylvania in 1900 was 2,456,838, including nearly 1,400,000 Rumans (Wallachs), upward of 800,000 Hungarians (Magyars), and upward of 230,000 Germans. Included among the Hungarians are the Szeklers, a people of Magyar stock. The Germans are mainly the descendants of immigrants from Germany who settled here in the Middle Ages. The region where they chiefly dwell, in the southern part of the country, is known as Saxonland. The largest towns are Klausenburg (Kolozsvár), Kronstadt (Brassó) and Hermannstadt (Nagy-Szeben), both in Saxonland, and Maros-Vásárhely. Klausenburg is the seat of a university. The Rumans belong to the Greek church. The bulk of the Hungarians are Roman Catholics, but a large fraction are Protestants, and there is a large body of Unitarians, Transylvania having been the cradle of Unitarianism.

In antiquity Transylvania formed part of Dacia. The Dacians were subdued by the Roman emperor Trajan at the beginning of the second century. The Roman dominion lasted less than two centuries. The country passed under the sway of one barbarous race after another, and during the second half of the Middle Ages formed part of the kingdom of Hungary. The Hungarian kings promoted the development of Transylvania by inviting Germans to settle in the region. The disaster which befel the Hungarians at Mohács at the hands of the Turks in 1526 broke up the Hungarian realm, Transylvania becoming a separate principality under the protection of the sultan. The dominions of the princes of Transylvania, some of whom played a considerable rôle, embraced part of Hungary proper. The collapse of the power of Turkey in the latter part of the seventeenth century enabled Austria to gain possession of Transylvania (which was secured to it in the peace of Karlowitz, concluded with the sultan in 1699). The country remained permanently under the rule of the Hapsburgs. In 1867–68 Transylvania was completely incorporated with Hungary.

Transylvania, a county in the SW. part of North Carolina, has an area of 371 sq. m. It is drained by the French Broad River. The southern part of this county is adjacent to the Blue Ridge. Capital, Brevard. Pop. in 1890, 5881; in 1900, 6620.

Trebitsch, trȧ'bitch, a town of Moravia, Austria-Hungary, 18 miles SE. of Iglau, on the Iglawa. It has a château and an interesting mediæval church. Among the leading industries are the manufacture of cloth and shoemaking. Horse fairs are held. Pop. in 1900 (including a suburb), 12,115.

Trebizond, trĕb'e-zond' (Turk. Tirabzon, tee-rȧb-zŏn' or Tarabezun'; L. Trap'ezus; Gr. Τραπεζοῦς, Trapezous, from Τράπεζα, a "table," so named with reference to the configuration of its site), a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, capital of the vilayet of Trebizond, on the eastern part of the coast of the Black Sea, 120 miles NW. of Erzerum. It presents externally a striking appearance, perched on a plateau-like height, with rocky declivities on two sides, enclosed by mediæval walls and dominated by an old castle in the rear. The Christian quarters of Trebizond are outside of the walls. The city has preserved interesting relics of Byzantine ecclesiastical architecture. The old Greek churches have in great part been transformed into mosques. The dwellings are mostly one-storied structures, standing in little walled gardens. The bazaars and khans are in the Christian quarter. Trebizond is the seat of an active trade. Its location long ago rendered it a great entrepôt of the commerce between Europe and Persia, but its position in this respect has greatly declined in consequence of the changes brought about by steam transportation. The exports include cattle, hazel-nuts, tobacco, carpets, silks, etc. The city labors under the disadvantage of possessing no real harbor. The population is estimated at about 35,000, of whom more than one-half are Turks. The Christians consist mainly of Greeks and Armenians, the former greatly outnumbering the latter. The city was colonized in remote antiquity by Greeks from Sinope. It was here that Xenophon and the Ten Thousand Greeks reached the sea in their memorable retreat. From 1204 to 1461 the city was the capital of the Greek empire of Trebizond, an offshoot of the Byzantine Empire.

Trebizond, a vilayet of Asiatic Turkey, in the northeastern part, extending along the coast of the Black Sea, and having the vilayets of Sivas and Erzerum on the S. Area, about 12,500 sq. m. Pop. estimated at about 950,000. Capital, Trebizond.

Treves, treevz (anc. Augusta Trevirorum; Fr. Trèves, traiv; Ger. Trier, treer), a city of Rhenish Prussia, picturesquely situated on the right bank of the river Moselle, here crossed by an ancient bridge of Roman origin, 57 miles SW. of Coblenz. In the old quarters the streets are narrow and crooked. Treves, which is perhaps the oldest town in Germany, is rich in Roman remains, comprising the interesting Porta Nigra, a turreted gate; a brick basilica dating from the fourth century, now a Protestant church; a large amphitheatre, the picturesque ruins of a Roman palace, and the remains of ancient baths. Among the main objects of interest in the town are the venerable cathedral, one of the oldest in Germany, containing the famous seamless "Holy Coat" and many monuments; the interesting Liebfrauenkirche, circular in form, with a richly decorated portal; the municipal library, containing many valuable incunabula and manuscripts; and the provincial museum, with a fine collection of antiquities. Just outside the town rises the column of the Virgin. The industries comprise iron-founding, tanning, dyeing, and the manufacture of furniture, pianos, stained-glass, etc. Treves was the capital of the Celtic Treviri and in later Roman times an imperial residence. It very early became the seat of a bishopric, which from the ninth century figures as an archiepiscopal see. The archbishops of Treves rose to the position of princes ruling a considerable district, and occupied a place among the Imperial Electors—the princes who had the privilege of choosing the head of the Holy Roman (German) Empire. The city prospered under its archbishops, but struggled to shake off their authority, and finally towards the close of the sixteenth century was recognized as a free imperial city. The ecclesiastical principality was extinguished in the wars of the French Revolution and most of the territory, together with the city of Treves, was assigned to Prussia by the Congress of Vienna. A new bishopric of Treves was instituted in 1802. Pop. in 1900, 43,506.

Trichinopoly, or Trichinopoli, a town of British India, capital of a district in Madras, on the river Cavery, 30 miles W. of Tanjore. It consists of the so-called fort, in which is the old town, and which has no longer its enclosing defences (on whose site there is now a boulevard), a civil and military station, and an aggregation of native villages. The only striking feature of Trichinopoly is a rocky height, which rises steeply from the midst of the fort, and on which are two temples, one of them a great resort of pilgrims. The most interesting edifice is the old nawab's palace, now used for government offices. St. John's Church contains the tomb of Bishop Heber, who died here. The city is the seat of a Roman Catholic bishop and of St. Joseph's College, a Roman Catholic institution, which in 1904 had about 1500 students. There are Protestant missions. The city is noted for its cigars and gold jewelry, and there are also manufactures of hardware, cutlery, and saddlery. Pop. in 1901, 104,690, the great majority of whom were Hindus. There are many thousand Christians.

Triest, tre-ĕst' (It. Trieste, tre-ĕs'tå; anc. Tergeste), the principal seaport of Austria-Hungary, capital of the Küstenland (Littorale or Coastland), on the Gulf of Triest, the northernmost part of the Adriatic Sea, 73 miles ENE. of Venice. Lat. of observatory, 45° 38′ 45″ N.; lon. 13° 45′ 45″ E. It constitutes with its district (combined area, 37 sq. m.) an Austrian crown-land. The city extends in the form of an amphitheatre along the slopes of the Karst. It consists of the old town, whose tortuous and steep streets rise from the foot of the Schlossberg, and the new quarter (or Theresienstadt), with broad streets and handsome houses, situated on a plain skirting the sea. The Corso, the most important thoroughfare, separates the two parts of the city. S. of the Corso are the two principal squares, the Piazza della Borsa and the Piazza Grande, the former containing the statue of Emperor Leopold I. and a handsome group of Neptune, and the latter a statue of Charles VI., to whom Triest is indebted for its rise to commercial prosperity. The Passeggio di Sant' Andrea, an avenue commanding fine views, extends along the shore on the S. for a distance of 3 miles. At the western end of the Corso, close to the harbor, are the splendid town-hall and the Tergesteo, an extensive structure, whose cruciform arcades serve as the exchange. The cathedral of San Giusto, situated on an eminence, and occupying the site of an ancient Roman temple, is the most noteworthy ecclesiastical structure. It was formed in the fourteenth century by the union of a small Byzantine church, dating from the sixth century, and two other religious edifices of equal age. San Niccolò dei Greci, the Greek church, has a lavishly decorated interior. Near Santa Maria Maggiore, a Jesuits' church, is the Arco di Riccardo, an old town-gate. The ruins of a Roman theatre and of an aqueduct are among the remains of antiquity. The Museo Lapidario, containing a collection of Roman antiquities, is situated in a now abandoned burial-ground, which contains the grave and monument of the archæologist Winckelmann, who was murdered at Triest in 1768. The Ferdinand-Maximilian Museum, in the building of the Nautical Academy, contains a remarkably complete collection of the fauna of the Adriatic Sea. Other objects of interest are the collections of the Municipal Museum of Antiquities and the paintings and sculptures in the sumptuous Palazzo Revoltella. On the Piazza Giuseppina is the bronze statue of Maximilian of Mexico, by Schilling. The famous château of Miramar, which belonged to Maximilian, 5 miles N. of Triest, commands a charming view of the city and the sea. The Public Garden (Giardino Pubblico) is the principal open-air resort within the city. The Imperial Academy, which imparts commercial and nautical instruction, is the principal institution of learning.

The harbor was greatly enlarged in 1867–76, and vast improvements, to be completed in 1912, are projected. The Canal Grande, about one-quarter of a mile long, penetrates into the new town. More than 10,000 vessels enter the harbor annually. The naval structures in the harbor comprise the extensive wharves of the Austrian Lloyd and of the Stabilimento Tecnico Triestino and the Arsenal of the Lloyd.

Triest is the chief emporium of the maritime trade of the empire. The principal manufactures, besides naval stores, include soap, candles, leather, machinery, oil-cloth, rosoglio, etc. There are iron-foundries, stone-cutting works, and vast petroleum refineries. The city is an important banking and insurance centre. Triest is the seat of a bishop. Pop. (with district) in 1890, 157,466; in 1900, 178,599. The great bulk of the inhabitants are Italians. The Slovens number about 25,000 and the Germans less than 10,000. Triest came into the possession of Austria in 1382.

Trinidad, trin'e-dad' (Sp. pron. tre-ne-ᵭåᵭ'), an island of the British West Indies, second in size to Jamaica, lies off the coast of Venezuela (bounding on the E. the Gulf of Paria) and opposite the northern mouths of the Orinoco. It is separated from the peninsula of Paria (Cumaná) by the Dragon's Mouth (Bocas de Dragos). Lat. of centre (approx.) 10° 30′ N. Area, 1754 sq. m. The northern and southern borders of the island are contoured by E.–W. ranges of mountains, which are structural continuations of the double chain of northern Venezuela and terminate in the NE. and SE. points of Trinidad known as Galera and Galeota points. The northern mountains attain in Tucutche Peak (Las Cuevas) an elevation of 3100 feet, which is the culminating point of the island. The southern elevations do not appear anywhere to greatly surpass 1000 ft. (Trinity Hill, in the SE.). The interior is in the main a low-lying undulating plain, or series of plains, with Tamana near the centre as its highest elevation (1120 ft.). The island is fairly well watered, streams descending to most parts of the coast. The largest streams are the Oropouche, Caroni, and Ortoire (or Guatuaro). Most of the island is still largely wooded and the forest unfolds itself with rare magnificence and luxuriance. The more striking native and cultivated forms of vegetation are represented by numerous palms, the silk-cotton tree, bread-fruit, tamarind, mango, bamboo, coffee, cacao, banana, and sugar-cane, the last four being extensively grown and giving to the island much of its agricultural resource. Among the animals are the mangrove-stag (or deer), paca, ant-eater, armadillo, sloth, tiger-cat, peccary, opossum, and monkey. Lizards and turtles are numerous and the alligator is fairly abundant in some places. Many of the most beautiful of the South American birds are represented on the island. The mineral resources of Trinidad, so far at least as they have been commercially worked, consist almost entirely of native pitch, which is obtained in large quantities from the famous pitch lake of La Brea, near the W. coast, which covers about 90 acres and which in 1903 yielded 192,221 tons of asphalt. Along the S. coast and not far from Icacas Point, which forms the SW. extremity of the island, are a number of mud volcanoes. The climate of Trinidad is unhealthy or malarial on the low-lying coasts, but in the interior, although with a hot, moist, and enervating temperature, it is fairly salubrious. Trinidad is a crown-colony, the public affairs being administered by a governor and by an executive and a legislative council. The island of Tobago belongs administratively to Trinidad. Port-of-Spain, on the NW. side of the island, is the capital and one of the finest towns in the West Indies. Trinidad was discovered by Columbus in 1498. It belonged to Spain till 1797, when it was seized by the English, who were confirmed in its possession by the treaty of Amiens in 1802. Pop. in 1884, 171,914; in 1891, 200,028; in 1901, 255,148 (chiefly of mixed African and European blood).

Tripoli, trip'o-le, called by the natives Tarabulus, tà-rà'boo-loos (anc. Tripolis), a region of northern Africa, included among the Barbary States, and constituting a vilayet or province of the Turkish Empire. In its broadest extent it occupies the entire Mediterranean border between Tunis on the W. and Egypt on the E., and thus includes Barca (mutessarriflik of Bengazi). Southward the boundaries are but ill-determined, but ordinarily they are made to include the region known as Fezzan, which is physiographically separated from what is frequently designated Tripoli proper by the vast rocky plateau known as the Hamada el-Homra (1500–1700 feet elevation) and the volcanic masses of the Jebel-Soda (or Black Mountain) and Haruj es-Sod. The characteristics of Barca and Fezzan will be found treated under their own heads. Tripoli proper extends not much beyond (southward of) lat. 29° N., thus lying entirely outside of the tropics. Its Mediterranean border is deeply indented by the Gulf of Sidra (anc. Syrtis Major) in the E., where the true desert (Libyan or Saharan) approaches quite to the sea. Otherwise the coast-line presents few indentations and is nearly destitute of harbors, almost the only really good one being that on which stands the city of Tripoli. The greater portion of the interior of Tripoli appears to be a sand and limestone plateau of moderate elevation, destitute of permanent water-courses, and irregularly relieved by minor mountain elevations or hilly ridges. In the NW., abutting upon the Mediterranean at Khoms and directed WSW., is the prominent escarpment known in its different parts as Jebel-Nefusa, Yefren, and Gharian (rising to 2600–3000 feet or more), beyond which is an expanse of plain and lowland designated the Plain of Tripoli (or the Jefara), which in its broadest part is about 90 miles wide. A minor portion of this plain, in the close surroundings of the capital city, is watered by means of irrigation wells and is cultivated. The most fertile tract of the vilayet is the Meshiya, a Mediterranean border-strip about 15 miles long, having the city of Tripoli near its centre, and extending inland hardly 5 miles. The whole of this district is occupied by fertile fields, on which wheat, barley, millet, and Indian corn are grown, and by plantations of date-palms, olive-groves, vineyards, orchards, and gardens, yielding in abundance oranges, pomegranates, lemons, figs, jujubes, apricots, plums, and watermelons. Other products of the coast are cotton, silk, tobacco, saffron, madder, and castor-oil. The interior produces senna, dates, and galls; the carob and lotus are indigenous. There are few products in Tripoli other than the agricultural. Barley is the most important crop. Some esparto grass is exported.

The climate of Tripoli has its distinctive African characteristics. The summers are hot, as well on the coast as in the interior, but sea-breezes render the former region quite bearable. Winter brings much cool and even cold weather, and snow rests for short periods on the upper hill-slopes, and occasionally on the basal plains. The average annual temperature of many parts of the interior is 80° or more, and in Fezzan, at Murzuk, an extreme shade-temperature of 135° has been noted. Rains in the coast region are not exceptional; in Barca the winter rainfall is 14–20 inches.

Tripoli proper and the mutessarriflik of Bengazi have together an area of about 400,000 sq. m. and a population estimated at about 1,000,000. The inhabitants comprise Berbers, Moors, Arab Bedouins, Jews, and negroes, with a few thousand Europeans, mainly Maltese and Italians.

The ancient name of Tripolis (i.e., "three cities") originated as a collective designation of the three cities of Œa, Leptis Magna, and Sabrata, situated on the Mediterranean coast. The first-named finally became known as Tripolis. The region formed part of the Roman Empire, and in later times there was a Provincia Tripolitana. In the seventh century northern Africa became part of the Mohammedan world. In the middle of the sixteenth century Tripoli was subjected by the Ottoman Turks. Under Turkish sovereignty the city of Tripoli became the seat of corsairs, who were the terror of the Mediterranean. The Tripolitans were repeatedly chastised by the French and in 1801–05 the United States waged a successful war against them. Under its beys the country was for a long time virtually independent of Constantinople.

Tripoli (anc. Œa), the capital of the vilayet of Tripoli, is situated on a rocky promontory of the Mediterranean Sea, in lat. 32° 54′ N., lon. 13° 11′ E. It is near the middle part of the very fertile border-strip designated the Meshiya, and back of it is the larger plain of Tripoli or the Jefara. The city presents with its surrounding wall, its mosques and minarets, a distinctly Oriental and even pleasing aspect as seen from the outside, but the interior, with its narrow and crooked streets or lanes and cheerless houses, is uninviting. The more notable buildings are the bey's castle, an ancient pile of vast extent, built so irregularly that all appearance of symmetry is lost, and the great mosque, a handsome and majestic structure, in which the roof, formed by a number of small cupolas, is supported by many Doric marble columns, said to have once belonged to a Christian church. The city has a number of Christian churches, a convent, several synagogues, a number of public baths, bazaars, caravansaries, and European hotels. Numerous ancient remains have been found here, among them a magnificent triumphal arch, erected in honor of the Roman emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. The only manufactures of any consequence are carpets, which have long been celebrated, mantles and other woollen stuffs, and ordinary and morocco leather. Tripoli has a fairly good and very capacious harbor, which is accessible to vessels drawing 14 feet or somewhat more. It has still an extensive trade with the far interior of the continent, and receives much barter commodities through its caravan connections with Wadai and Darfur, the region about Lake Chad, and Timbuktu. Pop. estimated at 25,000–30,000, of whom probably not less than 6000 are Jews, who occupy a special quarter of the city known as Harra. Tripoli Vecchia (trip'o-le vĕk'ke-å), or Old Tripoli, is a small maritime town, 45 miles W. of Tripoli.

Tripoli (Arab. Tarabulus, tå-rå'boo-loos; anc. Tripolis), a town of Syria, near the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, at the foot of a spur of Mount Lebanon, and at the mouth of the Kadisha, 40 miles NNE. of Beirut. Lat. 34° 26′ N. It presents a picturesque appearance with its white houses and around it are olive-groves, vineyards, and plantations of mulberries, oranges, and lemons. The streets are paved. There are many mosques, monasteries, and churches. An old castle overlooks the town. The port of Tripoli, El-Mina (Marina), is on a projecting tongue of land about 2 miles from the town, and is connected with it by a tramway. Tripoli has a large trade, exporting barley, raw silk, wool, soap, fruits, sponges, etc. It is a busy seat of the silk-industry and has extensive manufactures of soap. The place possesses numerous schools. The population, inclusive of El-Mina (which has about 7000 inhabitants), is estimated at 30,000. The Christians number about one-fifth of the total, the bulk of them being Greeks, who have the trade largely in their hands. Tripoli was one of the cities of the Phœnicians. It then stood close to the water. It was in the hands of the Crusaders during nearly the whole of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries and prospered under them. When the Moslems again came into possession, the place was rebuilt on a new site.

Tristan da Cunha, tris-tån' då koon'yå, the principal of a group of islets in the South Atlantic Ocean. Lat. 37° 6′ S.; lon. 12° 2′ W. The surface is mountainous. It rises from the longitudinal ridge which divides the Atlantic basin into an eastern and western trough, and attains in its loftiest (volcanic) summit a height of about 8300 feet. There is but one form of native arboreal vegetation, Phylica arborea. Apple- and peach-trees are productive, and potatoes grow well. The island contains several hundred head of cattle, sheep, and donkeys. The other islands of the group are Nightingale and Inaccessible. Tunis (Fr. Tunisie), a regency and French protectorate of northern Africa, one of the Barbary States, is bounded N. and E. by the Mediterranean Sea, SE. by Tripoli, S. and SW. by the Sahara, and W. by the department of Constantine, in Algeria. Ras-el-Abiad, or Cape Blanco, its northernmost point (lat. 37° 20′ N.), is likewise the northernmost projection of the African continent. Area, about 51,000 sq. m. In the coast are three great indentations, forming the Bay of Tunis on the N., and the Gulfs of Hammamet and Gabes, or the Lesser Syrtis, on the E. Tunis, which corresponds in greater part to the ancient Roman province of Africa (Africa in the narrower sense), and which still bears the native name of Ifrigia, is physiographically divided into four regions: the tell, or the well-watered and well-wooded mountain area that lies N. of the Mejerda River, and extends from the Algerian frontier to the Gulf of Tunis; the sahel, a somewhat less fertile and less well-watered area, which forms the eastern littoral, between Cape Bon and Tripoli; the central plateau or series of table-lands, of about 2000 feet general elevation, extending southward from the Mejerda to about lat. 34° 30′, and including within its limits the plain of Kairwan; and the Saharan tract, containing the great Shott Kebir (or Jerid), which is now more generally in the condition of a dried-out salt basin. In the Saharan region is the true Beled-el-Jerid ("land of dates") of the Arabs. The mountains of Tunis, whose ramifications extend over a large part of the country, are ordinarily considered to be a more or less direct continuation of the Atlas Mountains of Algeria, which enter from that country and proceed almost directly eastward to the eastern coast. They attain an extreme elevation of about 6500 feet, and terminate abruptly at Cape Bon and at other promontories of the E. coast, but find their orographic continuations in some of the outlying islands and in the table-lands of southern and western Sicily. The only river of any size is the Mejerda (anc. Bagradas). The floral and faunal characteristics of Tunis in general correspond to those of Algeria, and represent in the main the biotic types of the Mediterranean region of Europe, with a scattering infusion of the true African elements. Of the latter, among floral types, may be cited the extensive growths and even forests of date-palms (producing the finest dates of the continent), and the (now rather rare) lion and panther among quadrupeds. The myrtaceous plants are largely developed, and there are still extensive growths of the cork-oak on some of the mountain-slopes. The esparto-grass is cultivated in the steppe-region adjacent to the Sahara. In ancient times Tunis was one of the granaries of Rome, and agriculture still continues to be the chief industry of the people. Wheat, barley, and oats are the major cereal crops, the yield in 1904 having been: wheat, 10,518,934 bushels; barley, 14,814,624 bushels; and oats, 4,635,496 bushels. A large area is devoted to the cultivation of the olive, which yields olive-oil of the finest quality, and in the more favored regions there are beautiful orchards of fruit-trees (almonds, oranges, lemons, shaddocks, etc.). Other products are tobacco, cotton, henna, and the grape. The climate is on the whole healthy and agreeable, the intense summer heats being tempered by sea-breezes and by copious rainfalls during at least five months of the year (November to April or May). The mineral resources of the country (ores of lead and zinc) have not yet been largely developed, but there are extensive shipments of phosphate from the region about Gafsa. Much salt is obtained from the lakes and salines. The principal domestic animals are sheep, goats, cattle, mules, and camels. On several parts of the coast the fisheries, including those of coral, sponge, and tunny, are valuable.

The manufactures consist chiefly of woollen fabrics, ordinary and morocco leather, carpets and rugs, matting, embroidery, and pottery. Silk-weaving, formerly an extensive industry, has declined. The population of Tunis is estimated at nearly 2,000,000. It consists of Moors, Berbers, Arabs, Jews, French, Italians, and negroes. Nine-tenths of the inhabitants are Mohammedans. At the close of 1901 the French numbered 39,000, of whom more than one-third were soldiers and sailors. The Italians are nearly twice as numerous as the French. The number of Jews in Tunis is estimated at about 60,000. The ruler of the country bears the title of bey. The government is carried on under the direction of a French resident-general, who is minister of foreign affairs and president of the council of ministers. Nearly all the heads of the administrative departments are French, as are also the civil governors of the 13 districts into which the country is divided. There is a special department for Tunisian affairs in the French foreign office. The capital is Tunis. There are about 450 miles of steam railway in operation in the regency, the chief line being that which connects Bone and Guelma, in Algeria, with the city of Tunis.

Tunis contains many Roman remains, notably in the form of aqueducts. One of these, as in ancient times, furnishes the capital with excellent water, obtained from Mount Zaghwan (Zagouan, 5500 feet high), about 40 miles S. of the city of Tunis. Of ancient Carthage, the site of which is about 8 miles ENE. of the city of Tunis, practically nothing remains beyond the parts of a few cisterns.

History.—This region long constituted the main portion of the dominions of Carthage. The city of Tunis (Tunes) existed in ancient times. In the middle of the second century B.C. the country passed under the dominion of the Romans. It was occupied by the Vandals in the first half of the fifth century A.D., and a century later it was conquered by the Byzantines. The Saracens (Arabs) made themselves masters of it in the second half of the seventh century. They founded the city of Kairwan, which rose to be a great Mohammedan centre. Various Mohammedan dynasties succeeded one another in the Middle Ages. In 1270 Louis IX. of France engaged in a disastrous crusade against Tunis. In 1535 Charles V. undertook an expedition against the famous corsair Khair-ed-Din (Barbarossa), who had made the city of Tunis the seat of his power. The place fell into the hands of the Christians and an immense number of Christian slaves were liberated. In 1574 Tunis became subject to the sultan of Turkey. The authority of the military governors, called deys (elected by the soldiers), was before long overshadowed by that of the beys, who originally had charge of the collection of taxes and of tribute from the tribes. The beys succeeded one another as hereditary rulers, their dependence upon the Ottoman sultans amounting to little more than the payment of a regular tribute. The beys of Tunis harassed the Christian nations with their piracies, which continued down to the nineteenth century. The payment of tribute to the sultan ceased in 1871. In 1881 France sent an expedition against Tunis with the ostensible object of chastising the predatory Krumirs and compelled the bey to accept a French protectorate.

Tunis (anc. Tunes), capital of the French protectorate and regency of Tunis, is situated on the inner side of the shallow Lagoon of Tunis, about 12 miles from the Gulf of Tunis, an inlet of the Mediterranean Sea. Communication between the two bodies of water is made by the narrow Goletta Channel (or Strait), which conducts into a canalized water-way excavated in the lagoon and leading directly to the city. The Mejerda, which formerly discharged into the Lagoon of Tunis, now finds its way to the sea several miles to the N. Tunis is in lat. 36° 48′ N. and lon. 10° 24′ E. The city is surrounded by walls and defended by a strong castle, completely commanding the Goletta, and by several detached forts in other directions. The streets of the inner or old town are narrow, uneven, largely unpaved, and dirty; the houses are of stone or brick, generally of mean appearance, consisting only of a single story without exterior windows. Many of the shops and bazaars are well stocked and attractive, although mainly small, and the general aspect of the Mohammedan quarters is relieved by a number of mosques and minarets, the splendid Mosque of Yussuf and the palace of the bey (kasba) giving a marked character to this section of the city. The lower new town, or French section, the official "Tunis-Goletta," is almost entirely European in character, with fine hotels, cafés, theatres, churches of various denominations, tramways, etc. Tunis is the seat of a Mohammedan college, of a polytechnic school (situated beyond the city limits), and of various scientific and literary associations. Its water-supply is derived largely from Mount Zaghwan (Zagouan), 40 miles to the S., the water being conveyed by an ancient (Roman) aqueduct. The principal manufactures are linen and woollen cloths, red woollen caps, pottery, burnouses (mantles), embroidery, ordinary and morocco leather, various essences, soap, jewelry, and silk. The city is the terminus of a railway to Algiers and of steamship routes to Marseilles, Genoa, and other Mediterranean ports. Tunis is situated about 8 miles WSW. of the ruins of Carthage. Pop. about 180,000, of whom about 40,000 are European Christians and a nearly equal number Jews, the remainder being chiefly Moors, Arabs, and negroes. See TUNIS (regency).

Turi, too'ree, a town of Italy, province and 18 miles SSE. of Bari. Pop. in 1901, 6554.

Turí, too-ree', a village of Brazil, state of Maranhão, 40 miles NNW. of Guimaraens.

Turicum, a Latin name of ZÜRICH.

Turin (It. Torino, to-ree'no; anc. Augusta Taurinorum), a city of Italy, the chief city of Piedmont and the capital of the province of Turin, beautifully situated in a fertile plain, surrounded by the Alps, at the confluence of the Dora Riparia with the Po, 79 miles WSW. of Milan. Lat. of observatory, 45° 4′ 7″ N.; lon. 7° 41′ 8″ E. The city is laid out in rectangular streets. The principal thoroughfares are the Via Garibaldi, Via dell' Accademia delle Scienze, Via Cernaja, the broad Corso Vittorio Emanuele II. (leading to the square of the same name), and the handsome Via di Po, which leads to the river. On the Piazza Castello, which is in the centre of the city, is the Madama palace, a mediæval castle. N. of the square is the royal palace, which dates from 1646. It contains a remarkable collection of arms and armor. To the S. is the Piazza Carignano, with the Carignano palace, formerly the seat of the Sardinian chamber of deputies (1848–59) and the Italian parliament (1861–65), and now containing natural-history collections. Near by is the palace of the Academy of Sciences, formerly the Jesuit college, dating from 1679. The Palazzo di Città, the town-hall, was erected in 1669. The Palazzo delle Torri is a very ancient gateway with two mediæval towers.

Adjoining the royal palace is the cathedral (San Giovanni Battista), which occupies the site of three ancient churches. It dates from the fifteenth century and contains the burial-chapel of the dukes of Savoy. La Consolata, a church in the baroque style, built in the seventeenth century, has a campanile which originally belonged to an ancient convent (ninth century); the Tempio Valdese is a modern Protestant church; Corpus Domini dates from the seventeenth century; the church of San Domenico (with a fine madonna by Guercino) from the fourteenth; the domed Superga, the royal burial-church, rises on a hill E. of the city, commanding a splendid view.

Turin is rich in monuments. The most conspicuous is the structure known as the Mole Antonelliana, originally intended as a synagogue, but finished by the city in 1889 as a museum (Museo del Risorgimento Italiano) in memory of Victor Emmanuel II. The square, tower-like edifice, crowned by a gilded statue, is 538 feet in height. The Piazza Vittorio Emanuele II. contains another monument to the king; the colossal Mont Cenis Tunnel monument commemorates the names of the engineers of the work; the Crimean monument commemorates the part played by Sardinia as the ally of England and France against Russia in 1855. The monument to Cavour, erected in 1873, is most imposing. Among other monuments are those to Duke Ferdinand of Genoa, Amadeus VI., Victor Amadeus I., King Charles Albert, Garibaldi, and Duke Emmanuel Philibert, one of the most striking of the equestrian statues. The various arcades containing shops are an interesting feature of the city. A number of bridges span the Dora Riparia and the Po, the handsomest being the Ponte Emanuele I. and the Ponte Maria Teresa. The public garden on the left bank of the Po is a favorite open-air resort. It includes a botanical garden and a turreted royal château, now the home of the polytechnic institute. The royal garden and the Felice gardens are attractively laid out.

Among the educational institutions the university is foremost. The building dates from 1713; its fine late-Renaissance court and the corridors are embellished with numerous statues. The students number about 2700. The national (formerly university) library has about 300,000 volumes. The Museo Civico contains interesting collections of paintings, early sculptures, ceramics, etc.; the collections of the Academy of Sciences include a museum of Egyptian, Greek, and Roman antiquities; the picture-gallery (Pinacoteca) has valuable works of Dutch masters and of the early Italian schools; the collections of the Albertina academy of fine arts are less noteworthy. The arsenal has a remarkably complete collection of ordnance. Turin has a military academy, an archiepiscopal seminary, an agricultural college, an industrial museum, and a conservatory of music. The charitable institutions include several large hospitals (one, the Carità, providing for 2500 patients) and an institution for the blind.

Turin is an important industrial centre. Its manufactures include silks and other textiles, machinery, articles of iron and steel, porcelain, jewelry, furniture, pianos, chocolate, etc. It is the seat of an archbishop. The city is exposed to piercing winds from the Alps in winter. Mean temperature of January, 33°; of July, 74°. Pop. (commune) in 1881, 252,832; 1901 (commune), 335,656.

Turin rose into importance as the capital of the dominions of the House of Savoy, which were erected in 1720 into the kingdom of Sardinia, and which finally expanded into the kingdom of Italy. The city was the capital of Italy from 1861 to 1865, when the seat of government was removed to Florence. The Imperialists, under Prince Eugene, won a memorable victory over the French at Turin in 1706.

Turís, too-reece′, a commune of Spain, province and 20 miles WSW. of Valencia. Pop. in 1900, 4802.

Turka, toor′kå, a town of Austria-Hungary, in Galicia, 28 miles SSW. of Sambor. Pop. in 1900, 6080.

Turkestan, toor\kes-tån′, a name applied to two regions of Central Asia which have no very precise boundaries and are separated from one another by the great bulwark of the Tian-Shan Mountains and their continuations: Russian Turkestan, the region lying to the W., and Chinese (or Eastern) Turkestan, the region lying to the E., the latter comprising the vast territory of the Chinese Empire that is enclosed between Tibet on the S. and Mongolia on the N., and which has the Desert of Gobi on the E., and the Pamir, the Tian-Shan, and other mountains on the W. A part of Turkestan is included in the Afghan dominions. See AFGHANISTAN.

RUSSIAN TURKESTAN (a name that corresponds in its application largely to the now obsolete "Independent Tartary" and to "Turan") comprises in its combined physiographic and political aspect nearly the entire region that is embraced in the provinces (territories) of Samarkand, Ferghana, Syr-Darya (with Amu-Darya), and Semiryetchensk, and the Transcaspian Territory, together with the vassal states of Bokhara and Khiva. For administrative purposes there is a general government of Turkestan. The major portion of this tract, which extends westward to the Caspian Sea, is in the form of barren, or partially cultivated, steppe and desert—a region of progressive desiccation, of disappearing waters, of lakes, salines, and sinks, of scanty rainfall, and of accentuated summer and winter temperatures. With mountain heights towering into perpetual snow in its eastern parts (Ferghana, Semiryetchensk), the region drops on the borders of the Caspian Sea, to a level of 80–85 feet below the surface of the Mediterranean Sea. The principal waters are the Aral Sea and its two main feeders,—the Amu-Darya and Syr-Darya, together with their not very important tributaries. Lakes Issyk-Kul and Balkash (with its chief tributary, the Ili) in the E. are by many geographers included within the boundaries of Turkestan. The Tchu, a large river that marks off the region on the N. from the Kirghiz territory (Akmolinsk) and from the singular Bed-pak-dala, or "hunger steppe," was at one time a tributary of the Syr-Darya, but is now lost in the sands. The steppes of Turkestan, which are continued westward into Russia proper, present during the greater part of the year a desolate aspect, but during a period of about two months a vigorous and beautiful vegetation of herbs and flowers responds to the vivifying influence of fairly copious rains. Irrigation water-courses, especially in the border-lands of the Syr-Darya, have done much to reclaim what would otherwise be desert, and have brought into existence large fields of wheat, barley, rice, and sugar-cane, beautiful orchards of various kinds of fruit, vineyards, mulberry-plantations, melon-gardens, etc. The range of temperature, measured by the extremes of summer and winter, is about 140°,—from 115° to —25°. The animal life of the region is a composite of European and Asiatic elements, the latter comprising the lion, panther, and various antelopes. The wild boar is still fairly plentiful, and there are large droves or herds of wild asses and wild sheep and goats. The camel is one of the most serviceable of the domesticated animals. Russian Turkestan is traversed by several important caravan routes, the significance of which has largely disappeared as the result of the construction of the Transcaspian railway and of the more recently opened railway from Orenburg to Tashkent, the capital of the general government of Turkestan and the most important mart in the region. The population consists mainly of Uzbeks, Turkomans, Kirghizes, Sarts, Tajiks, and Russians. The general government of Turkestan (Samarkand, Ferghana, Syr-Darya, Semiryetchensk, Transcaspian Territory, and the Russian part of the Pamir) has an area of about 650,000 sq. m., and between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 inhabitants.

CHINESE TURKESTAN is comprised between about lat. 35° 15′ and 45° 40′ N. and lon. 73° 30′ and 98° 20′ E., and constitutes broadly the Chinese province of Sin-tsiang. It covers an area of about 580,000 sq. m. and has a population estimated at about 2,000,000. Physiographically, it is divided into two major divisions by the extension into it of the Tian-Shan Mountains,—the basin of the Tarim on the S. (the Tian-Shan-Nan-Lu of the Chinese, or "country S. of the Tian-Shan"), sometimes also designated Kashgaria, and the Dzungarian basin on the N. The great Tarim basin, which abuts westward upon the main Tian-Shan Mountains and the Pamir bulwark, and has for its S. boundary the Kuen-lun and Altyn-Tag ranges, is largely in the form of inhospitable and almost uninhabited desert of continuously moving sand-dunes (which, as in the SW. region between the Khotan and Kerya rivers, have overwhelmed and buried former sites of habitation) and of shallow and shifting lakes. The greater part of the region lies at an elevation of 3000–4000 feet above sea-level, and has most of the inhabited areas and districts near to the bases and on the declivities of the bounding mountains, where many fertile tracts are found. Close to the foot of the Bogdo-Ola Mountains, SE. of Turfan, is the remarkable depression of Luktchun, which descends to 420 feet below sea-level. The centre of the country forms the basin of the Lop-Nor, a lake variable in length and in position, fed from the W. by the Tarim and its four great tributaries or arms, the Kashgar, Yarkand (or Zerafshan), Khotan, and Aksu. Its basin is almost wholly a sandy waste. The heat in summer is great. In winter, frost and snow are common in the W., but are rare in the E. Abundant rains occur at this season in the mountains, but seldom in the lower country, where water for irrigation is stored in reservoirs. On the declivities and borders of the mountains, rice, wheat, millet and other grains, pulse, sesamum and other oil-seeds, cotton, etc., are raised in considerable quantities, besides hemp, flax, and dye-plants. Grapes, melons, pomegranates, and other fruits of southern climates come to great perfection. Mulberry-plantations are numerous, and much silk is produced. The rearing of live-stock is the chief branch of rural industry. The domestic animals include horses, yaks and other cattle, camels, and sheep. Horses and camels, thought to be in a condition of true wildness, are found in herds on the Lop desert-region, where the wild ass is also abundant. The ranges of the Tian-Shan are thought to be the native country of the two-humped (or Bactrian) camel. The argali (or wild sheep) is found. Among the carnivora are the tiger, wolf, jackal, lynx, and fox. Gold, copper, iron, nitre, asbestos, and other minerals are found in various parts of the mountain-regions, sal-ammoniac and sulphur in great quantities in the districts of the Bogdo-Ola and around Turfan. The true jade (or nephrite), so highly esteemed in China, is found in some of the mountain-gorges traversed by the upper waters of the Yarkand and Khotan and by the Karakasb, a tributary of the Khotan.

The minor Dzungarian basin, lying N. of the Tian-Shan and Bogdo-Ola Mountains, and forming the southern part of the larger region known as Dzungaria, is of much lower elevation than the basin of the Tarim, and only exceptionally (barring the protruding mountains) rises to a level exceeding 1500–2000 feet; in many parts, on the other hand, as in the lakes known as Telli-Nor and Ebi-Nor, it falls to 1000 feet and less. See DZUNGARIA.

Chinese Turkestan has an extensive trade, chiefly with Kashmir, the Russian Empire, China, and Tibet. The great Peking caravan route enters the region near its SE. extremity, and following a line of oases or wells in a northerly direction reaches Khami (or Khamil), where it divides into a northerly and southerly route; the former, via Barkul and Kulja, following the northern base of the Tian-Shan (and passing into Semiryetchensk), and the latter, via Turfan and Aksu, following the southern base of these mountains and ultimately reaching Kashgar and Yarkand. Kashgar is the seat of government and the chief emporium of trade with Russia. Other large marts and centres of population are Yarkand and Khotan.

The inhabitants of Chinese Turkestan comprise a number of peoples, mainly of Turkic stock, mostly with an infusion of Aryan blood. There are Kirghizes, Kara-Kirghizes, Tarantches, Uzbeks, Dungans, Kalmucks, Tajiks, etc., with remnants of Aryan peoples in the mountainous parts. The speech of the inhabitants is mostly a Turkic tongue. The prevailing religion is Mohammedanism. This region has been under the dominion of China since the middle of the eighteenth century. From 1865 to 1877 the famous Yakub Bey played an important rôle in Chinese Turkestan as ruler of an independent state, whose capital was Kashgar.

Turkestan, a town of Asiatic Russia, in Syr-Darya, 145 miles NW. of Tashkent. It was formerly an important place of pilgrimage, and its mosque Hazret-Yassavi, constructed by Tamerlane, is one of the most striking edifices of central Asia. Pop. in 1897, 11,598.

Turkeve, toor′kĕ\vĕ\, a town of Hungary, in Great Cumania, 15 miles SW. of Karczag. Pop. in 1900, 13,797.

Türkheim, türk'hīme, a town of Alsace, Germany, 3 miles W. of Colmar. It was made a free imperial city of the Holy Roman (German) Empire early in the fourteenth century. It was annexed to France by Louis XIV. and became German again in 1870. Pop. about 2500.

Türkheim, a town of Bavaria, district of Swabia, on the Wertach, 25 miles SSW. of Augsburg. Pop. about 2000.

Turkish (or Ottoman) Empire (Turk. Memalik-i Osmaniyeh), a state whose dominions comprise portions of Asia, Europe, and Africa. Its capital is Constantinople, situated on the European side of the Bosporus, the narrow strait connecting the Black Sea with the Sea of Marmora and thus with the Mediterranean. The principal portion of the empire is Asiatic Turkey, comprising Asia Minor (Anatolia), together with its islands, Turkish Armenia, most of Kurdistan, Mesopotamia, Irak-Arabi (the region about the lower Euphrates and Tigris), Syria (with Palestine), and part of Arabia. Turkey in Europe comprises the southern part of the Balkan Peninsula outside of Greece. The portion of Africa subject to the Sultan of Turkey comprises Tripoli, Fezzan, and Barca. In addition to the above possessions, the Turkish empire includes nominally several regions which figure either as tributary states (states paying annual tribute in money but otherwise independent of the sultan) or as provinces under foreign occupation. The tributary states include the principality of Bulgaria (with Eastern Rumelia), Egypt, and Samos. The regions nominally subject to the sultan but under foreign rule are Bosnia and Herzegovina (forming part of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy), Crete (ruled by Prince George of Greece as High Commissioner), and Cyprus (now a British possession). The dominions actually subject to the Turkish sultan have an aggregate area of about 1,150,000 sq. m., distributed as follows: Europe, 65,000; Asia, 700,000; Africa, 400,000. Their population is estimated at about 25,000,000. Including all its dependencies, real or nominal, the empire embraces about 1,600,000 sq. m. with about 40,000,000 inhabitants. The Turkish Empire is the leading Mohammedan state in the world, but the Mohammedan subjects of the king of England are far more numerous than those of the sultan. Previous to the last war with Russia (1877–78) Bulgaria, Eastern Rumelia, Bosnia, and Herzegovina constituted integral parts of the Turkish Empire, and Servia and Rumania were in a measure vassal states. At the close of that struggle a great part of Armenia was ceded to Russia and Cyprus passed virtually under the rule of Britain. Until recently Tunis was a vassal state of Turkey. Previous to 1898 Crete formed an integral part of the Turkish Empire. In the course of the nineteenth century the hold of the sultan upon Egypt was gradually relaxed, so that that country, in spite of the annual tribute, can no longer be regarded as a Turkish dependency.

Turkey in Europe is bounded on the N. by Servia, Bulgaria, and Eastern Rumelia; on the E. by the Black Sea and the Bosporus; on the S. by the Sea of Marmora, the Ægean Sea, and Greece; and on the W. by the Ionian Sea, the Strait of Otranto, and the Adriatic Sea. It embraces Thrace, Macedonia, Old Servia, and Albania. It comprises the vilayet (or province) of Adrianople (Edirneh), part of the vilayet of Constantinople, and the vilayets of Saloniki, Monastir, and Kossovo. Part of the vilayet of the Archipelago (islands in the Ægean Sea) is included in it. European Turkey is almost wholly a region of mountains. In the middle portion are the Rhodope Mountains (Despoto-Dagh, Despoto-Planina) and the Perim-Dagh, and at their northern extremities, on the Bulgarian border, the Rilo-Dagh. The peaks here have elevations of between 7000 and 9000 feet. In the W. Albania and Old Servia present a great complex of mountain-ranges, the highest of which, the Shar-Dagh, has a peak about 10,000 feet high. In the extreme S. is Mount Olympus, scarcely less elevated, and to the W. of this a part of the Pindus. In the extreme E. is the Istranja-Dagh. The principal rivers are the Maritza (whose valley presents one of the few plains of considerable extent to be found in European Turkey), the Mesta, Struma, and Vardar, all flowing into the Ægean Sea, and the Drin and Voyussa (Viosa), which flow into the Adriatic. These streams are not navigable, with the exception of the Maritza, which is so for a short distance. There are a number of lakes, principally in the W., the largest being Okhrida, Presba, and Scutari. The region enjoys on the whole a mild and salubrious climate. The summers are hot and dry. European Turkey contains a large area of cultivable land, but the political and economic conditions and the inadequate means of transportation have hindered agricultural development. Thrace and Macedonia yield bountiful crops of cereals. All the fruits of the temperate zone thrive, together with olives and almonds. The vineyards and plum orchards are a great source of riches. Much tobacco is grown and sesame is an important crop. Large numbers of cattle (including the buffalo, which is extensively used as a draught animal), sheep, and goats are reared. The population of European Turkey is estimated at about 6,000,000. It is composed mainly of Turks, Slavs (Serbs and Bulgarians), Albanians, Greeks, Tsintsars (a Ruman or Wallach people), Jews, Armenians, Levantines (descendants of Europeans and Oriental women), and Gypsies. The Turks are concentrated in the eastern part, especially in and about Constantinople and Adrianople.

Turkey in Asia, exclusive of Arabia, extends eastward from the Mediterranean Sea to Persia, and reaches in the SE. to the head of the Persian Gulf. It is estimated to contain 16,000,000 or 17,000,000 inhabitants. Its principal portion is the great peninsula of Asia Minor, between the Black Sea and the Sea of Marmora on the N. and the Mediterranean on the S. Asia Minor is a region of table-lands walled around by lofty mountain-ranges, which form great buttresses along the coasts except on the deeply indented shores of the Ægean, where the descent is more terrace-like. The principal range is the Taurus, in the S., with its eastern and western continuations. The interior plateaus are to a great extent arid but interspersed with many productive districts. The encircling mountains, in great part forest-clad, present fertile valleys. The W. coast is fringed with islands, the largest in the Grecian Archipelago. Among them are Lesbos, Rhodes, Chios, Lemnos, and Samos. The largest river of Asia Minor is the Kizil-Irmak, which flows into the Black Sea. The region produces grain, raisins, wine, olives, figs, tobacco, silk, opium, cotton, and valonia. Among the domestic animals is the Angora goat. Asia Minor contains the great body of the Turkish people. There are large numbers of Armenians and Greeks. Asia Minor comprises part of the vilayet of Constantinople, the mutessarriflik of Ismid, the vilayet of Khodavendikyar, the mutessarriflik of Bigha, the bulk of the vilayet of the Archipelago, the vilayets of Aidin (Smyrna), Konich, Angora, Kastamuni, Trebizond, Sivas, and Adana, and the sanjak of Marash (part of the vilayet of Aleppo). To the E. of Asia Minor are the lofty mountains and high table-lands and valleys of Armenia and Kurdistan (the land of the Kurds). These regions embrace the vilayets of Mamuret ül-Aziz, Erzerum, Van, Bitlis, and Diarbekr. From the highlands of Armenia and Kurdistan descend the Euphrates and Tigris, which unite to form the Shat el-Arab before pouring their waters into the Persian Gulf. These two great rivers water the extensive plain of Mesopotamia, a region peopled mainly by Arabs. Extending eastward from the shores of the Mediterranean to Mesopotamia is Syria, the western part of which is a region of mountains (Lebanon, Anti-Libanus, the mountains of Palestine), containing much cultivable land, while the eastern part is to a great extent desert. It is inhabited by Arabs, Arabic-speaking descendants of the ancient Syrians, Druses, Franks, Jews, and Turks. Mesopotamia and Syria embrace the vilayets of Bagdad, Mosul, and Basra, the mutessarriflik of Zor, the vilayets of Syria (Damascus) and Beirut, the bulk of the vilayet of Aleppo, and the mutessarifliks of the Lebanon and of Jerusalem. The portions of Arabia included in the Turkish Empire are a long and extensive strip in the W., stretching along the whole extent of the Red Sea, and a strip of country in the E., extending along the W. shore of the Persian Gulf. The former comprises Hejaz and Yemen; the latter is the region known as El-Hasa. Hejaz contains the holy cities of Mecca and Medina. The African dependencies (Tripolitana) comprise the vilayet of Tripoli and the mutessarrifilik of Bengazi.

Among the chief exports of Turkey are raisins, silk, barley, valonia, opium, figs, mohair, wool, coffee, hides and skins, olive oil, minerals, carpets, animals, sesame, drugs, licorice, fruits, salt fish, and sponges. The principal Turkish ports are Constantinople, Saloniki, Smyrna, Trebizond, and Beirut. The internal trade is mainly in the hands of the Armenians and Greeks. There are nearly 3000 miles of railway, over one-half being in Asiatic Turkey. The manufacturing industry is but little developed, the product for which Turkey is most noted being its carpets.

The government of the Turkish Empire is a despotism. The sultan is the spiritual as well as the temporal head of the state, professing to be the successor of the caliphs. His chief officer is the grand-vizier. The Sheikh-ul-Islam presides over ecclesiastical affairs and is at the same time the supreme interpreter of the law, which is based upon the teachings of the Koran. The council of the empire (Divan), composed of the grand-vizier, the heads of the various ministries, the president of the council of state, and the Sheikh-ul-Islam, meets in the palace of the Sublime Porte. The servants and interpreters of the law and of religion constitute the great body known as the Uleima. The bulk of the land in the Turkish dominions belongs to the sultan and to pious foundations. While Islam is the established religion, the Christian churches and Judaism are tolerated. The Christians number several millions.

The Ottoman or Osmanli Turks belong to the Uralo-Altaic family of nations, constituting with the Turkomans, Uzbeks, Tartars, and other kindred peoples the Turko-Tartaric branch of the family. Most closely allied to this division of the Uralo-Altaic stock is the Finno-Ugric branch, to which the Finns and Magyars (Hungarians) belong. The Turks are a well-formed race, with fine physiognomy and pleasing address. They are dignified in their behavior, industrious, honest, frugal, abstemious, hospitable, and brave. They are fanatic in their devotion to Islam and capable of being roused to the perpetration of the most savage atrocities upon their Christian neighbors, whom they despise. Women occupy a degraded position among the Turks. Polygamy is largely confined to the wealthier classes, the ordinary Turk having but a single wife. The Turks are intellectually a highly endowed race and possess an extensive literature. They are little responsive to civilizing influences from without. Corruption permeates the political organism and has blighted the energies of the nation.

At the end of the thirteenth century, Osman or Othman laid the foundations of the empire of the Ottoman Turks in Asia Minor. In 1453 the Turks took Constantinople and made it their capital. Their realm was at the height of its power in the middle of the sixteenth century, when the sway of the sultan extended into the heart of Hungary and the khan of the Crimea was subject to his authority, while in Africa Egypt was an integral part of the empire and Algeria, Tunis, and Tripoli were Turkish possessions. With the defeat of the Turks before Vienna in 1683 began the break-up of this mighty state. Austria expelled the Turks from Hungary; Russia, in a long series of wars, deprived them of the regions b tween the mouths of the Danube and the Caucasus and of western Transcaucasia; the Servians and Greeks rose successfully in the early part of the nineteenth century; the power of the Porte has nearly vanished from Africa; and finally the Russo-Turkish war of 1877–78 deprived Turkey of much of the fairest portion of its territory in Europe.

Turkmantchai, toork-mân-chī′, a small place in Persia, about 70 miles SE. of Tabriz. By the treaty concluded here in 1828 Russia obtained possession of the greater part of Persian Armenia.

Turkomans, a Turkic people inhabiting Russian Turkestan (including the Transcaspian territory), together with parts of Persia and Afghanistan. They are largely nomadic. Their numbers are estimated roughly at 1,000,000–1,200,000.

Turks Islands, a group of small islands among the Bahamas, the largest (called Grand Turk or Turk's Island) about 110 miles N. of Santo Domingo. Together with the Caicos Islands they constitute a dependency of Jamaica. The seat of government is at Grand Turk, on the island of the same name. This town had a population in 1901 of 1751. The most important industry of the islands is salt-raking.

Tuscany (It. Toscana, tos-kä'nä), a region embracing the SW. part of the N. half of Italy, bordering on the Mediterranean Sea and bounded on the N. by Emilia, E. by the Marches and Umbria, SE. by the compartimento of Rome, and W. (in the extreme N.) by Liguria. Area, 9287 sq. m. Tuscany, formerly a grand-duchy, is now a compartimento in the kingdom of Italy, and comprises the provinces of Arezzo, Florence, Grosseto, Leghorn (with the island of Elba), Lucca, Massa e Carrara, Pisa, and Siena. The surface is largely mountainous, the Apennines traversing the country in the N. and NE. The portion of the Apennines known as the Apuan Alps attains a height of nearly 6400 feet. The principal river is the Arno, which is joined by nearly all the streams flowing from the SW. slopes of the Apennines. Other rivers are the Cecina, Ombrone, and Serchio. The canal of Chiano joins the Arno with the Tiber, which rises in the E. part of Tuscany. The soil is fertile, and the climate, with the exception of the marshy tract (Maremme) along the southern part of the coast, is healthful. Wine (Chianti and Montepulciano), oil, maize, and raw silk are produced in considerable quantities. The mineral springs of Tuscany are famous. The mineral deposits include iron-ore, copper, lead, mercury, borax, and salt. Florence, Leghorn, Pisa, and Pistoja are the principal industrial centres.

Tuscany in ancient times was included in Etruria, the principal home of the Etruscans. Among the leading Etruscan cities were Tarquinii, Veii, Volsinii (Bolsena), Clusium (Chiusi), Cæræ (Cerveteri), Volaterræ (Volterra), Cortona, Arretium (Arezzo), and Perusia (Perugia, situated without the borders of Tuscany). The subjugation of the Etruscans by the Romans was completed in the third century B.C. In later times the Romans gave the name of Tuscia to the region. Countess Mathilda of Tuscany (1076–1115) is celebrated in history as a supporter of the papacy. She bequeathed her dominions to the papal see, but their possession was disputed by the German emperors. At this time the cities of Tuscany were rising to independence and importance, and the territories in dispute became the property of small but flourishing commonwealths that were to play an important rôle in the affairs of Italy. Pisa was long the most powerful maritime state on the shores of the Mediterranean, maintaining herself against the rising power of Genoa, which finally triumphed over her rival in 1284. By the thirteenth century Florence had become a prosperous and powerful republic. Other important commonwealths were Siena, Lucca, and Arezzo. Before the close of the Middle Ages Florence, under the Medici, was all-powerful in Tuscany, whose history is finally merged in that of the Florentine state. Tuscany led Europe in the revival of the arts and letters. The names of Giotto, Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio are intimately associated with the glories of her mediæval past. The Tuscan dialect became the literary language of Italy. In 1569 the Florentine dominions were erected into the grand-duchy of Tuscany. In 1737 the Medici dynasty became extinct and the grand-duchy passed to Francis Stephen of Lorraine, the husband of Maria Theresa, and from 1745 emperor of Germany. Tuscany continued under the rule of the house of Hapsburg-Lorraine, except in the Napoleonic period (during part of which it was ruled by the Bourbon dynasty of Parma as the kingdom of Etruria) down to 1859. In 1860 it was annexed to the dominions of Victor Emmanuel II., to become in 1861 part of the kingdom of Italy.

Tyrol, tĭr′rol (Ger. Tirol, te-rōl′), a crown-land of Austria-Hungary, in Cisleithania, constituting with Vorarlberg the westernmost part of the monarchy. It is bounded on the N. by Bavaria, on the E. by the Austrian crown-lands of Salzburg and Carinthia, on the SE. by Italy (Venetia), and on the W. by Italy (Lombardy), Switzerland, and the Austrian crown-land of Vorarlberg, which is administratively connected with Tyrol. It is situated between the parallels of 45° 40′ and 47° 40′ N. lat. Area, 10,300 sq. m.; area of Tyrol and Vorarlberg, 11,324 sq. m. Pop. of Tyrol in 1900, 850,062; of Tyrol and Vorarlberg, 981,949. Tyrol is rugged throughout, and in the grandeur of its towering mountain-heights, its beetling precipices, deep and secluded valleys, and vast ice-fields, stands second only to Switzerland, from which, however, it is distinguished by the almost total absence of lakes of large size. There are a few glacial tarns scattered about, and the Lago di Garda just enters within the SW. border. All of the mountains of Tyrol are members of the great Alpine system, representing the division known as the Eastern Alps, and they comprise a number of well-defined subordinate groups, such as the Giudicarian (with the Adamello), Ortler, and Ötzthal Alps in the W.; the Zillerthal Alps in the N.; the Marmolado and Trentino (Trent) Alps in the S. The loftiest summit, which is also the culminating point of the Eastern Alps, is the Ortler Spitze, 12,800 feet. One of the grandest of the Alpine regions of Europe is that of the limestone Fassa Mountains, in the SE., bordering upon Venetia, which, together with some adjacent mountains and valleys, are broadly known as the Dolomites, and of which, perhaps, the most imposing section is that of Ampezzo (on the route to Belluno). (See ALPS and DOLOMITES.) The loftiest carriage road of all Europe is that over the Stelvio Pass (Stilfser Joch), a few miles from Trafoi, 9055 ft. The Tyrolese mountains likewise have the lowest of the passes traversing a main chain of the Alps, the Brenner, 4490 ft., which is also the oldest of the Alpine routes; the railway traversing it was opened in 1867.

Tyrol is watered by the Adige (Etsch), Inn, Drave, Isel, Fleims, Ziller, and other streams, the drainage of the land being divided between the basins of the Danube and the Adriatic. A portion of the Engadine Valley is continued from Switzerland into the Upper Inn Valley in the W. None of the rivers is of much importance for navigation. In the number and beauty of their water-falls and cascades they impress a distinctive grandeur upon the wild nature of which they are a part.

In the northern section the climate is rather raw and cold, but in the S. it is very mild, in parts almost Italian, the heat of summer being excessive. About one-fifth of the whole surface is occupied by perpetual snows, glaciers, and inaccessible barren rocks. Rather more than a third is covered with forests. Most of the remainder consists of Alpine pastures. The tilled land comprises but a very small percentage of the total area. The various cereals are cultivated, including maize. Among other crops are pulse, potatoes, turnips, cabbages, flax, hemp, and tobacco. Tyrol is rich in fruits, including those of the subtropical class (oranges, lemons, olives, almonds), as well as those of the temperate zone. The Tyrolese apples are famous, and southern Tyrol produces fine wines. Live-stock is extensively reared, the value of the dairy products being very great. The rearing of silk-worms is a considerable industry. The products of the chase, of which the Tyrolese are passionately fond, include deer, chamois, and foxes. The mineral resources of Tyrol, formerly of importance, are now inconsiderable. Iron, copper, argentiferous lead, zinc, and sulphur are obtained, but the product is small. The salines at Hall are very productive. There are many mineral springs. Tyrol does not hold an important position as a manufacturing region, although a great variety of industries are carried on, mostly on a small scale. The textile industry is represented by numerous establishments and many kinds of metallic wares are manufactured. The Tyrolese display great ingenuity and taste in the manufacture of articles of wood.

About 55 per cent. of the inhabitants are Germans. The remainder are nearly all Italians and Ladins (speaking a Romanic language). The religion is Roman Catholic. Tyrol has a diet composed of deputies representing the towns, rural communes, landed aristocracy, and the church. The capital is Innsbruck. Among other towns are Bozen, Roveredo, Trent, and Brixen. Of the many health-resorts, the most noted is Meran. There is a university at Innsbruck.

Tyrol formed part of ancient Rhætia, which was conquered by the Romans in the reign of Augustus, in 15 B.C. After the downfall of the Roman Empire various waves of Germanic invasion passed over it. Much of the region was for a long time under the sway of ecclesiastical princes, the bishops of Brixen and Trent. Since 1363 the country has belonged to the house of Austria. In 1805 Napoleon transferred Tyrol to Bavaria. In 1809–10 it witnessed the memorable rising under Hofer and others, which was quelled by the French. In 1814 Austria recovered possession.

Tyrone, tī-rōn′, a county of Ireland, in Ulster, having N. the co. of Londonderry. Area, 1260 sq. m. It is mountainous in the N. It belongs mainly to the basin of the river Foyle, but a large section in the SE. is drained into Lough Neagh, which is on the eastern border. Oats, potatoes, and flax are extensively grown. Considerable coal is mined. The county sends 4 members to the House of Commons. Capital, Omagh. Pop. in 1841, 313,000; in 1901, 150,470.

United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, formerly Northwest Provinces and Oudh, an administrative province in the N. part of British India, having the Punjab on the NW., Bengal on the SE., Central India and Rajputana on the S. and SW., and Nepal on the N. A portion of the northern boundary is also formed by Tibet, with the Himalayas as the boundary wall. Area (exclusive of native states), 107,164 sq. m. Pop. in 1901, 47,691,782, of whom nearly six-sevenths were Hindus and nearly all the remainder Mohammedans. The region occupies the upper Ganges valley, and is traversed in almost parallel lines by the Jumna, the Ganges, and the Gogra. The Ibi Gamin Pass, one of the loftiest of the Himalaya passes (20,459 feet), traverses the Tibetan mountain bulwark. Nanda Devi, near the Nepal frontier and lying close to the sources of the Ganges, rises to 25,600 feet. The United Provinces of Agra and Oudh rank next to the Punjab as a wheat-producing section of the empire and take first position in the production of cane-sugar. Rice is very extensively cultivated, and there are large crops of millet and other food cereals, pulse, etc. Among other products are cotton, oil-seeds, and opium. The climate is in great part unhealthful, and much jungle remains about the foot of the mountains. The region had in 1902–1903 5650 miles of railway. The United Provinces of Agra and Oudh are under a lieutenant-governor, appointed by the governor-general of India with the approval of the crown. Capital, Allahabad. The largest city is Lucknow, in Oudh. Other populous cities are Benares, Cawnpore, Agra, Bareilly, and Meerut. Connected with the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh are the native states of Gurhwal and Rampur, having together an area of about 5000 sq. m. and a population of about 800,000. See OUDH.

United States, The (officially The United States of America; Fr. États-Unis, ā′tāz′ ü′nee′; Sp. Estados Unidos, ās-tā′dōce oo-nee′dōce; It. Stati Uniti, stā′tee oo-nee′tee; Ger. Vereinigte Staaten, fẹr-ī′nig-tẹh stā′tẹn), a federal republic of North America, comprising, exclusive of Alaska, which lies at a distance of several hundred miles from the main body of the country, and the recently acquired Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, and Hawaiian Islands, a vast tract extending from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific, and bounded on the N. by the Dominion of Canada, and on the S. by the Gulf of Mexico and the Republic of Mexico. The northern boundary, W. of the 95th meridian of W. longitude, is constituted almost entirely by the 49th parallel of N. latitude; E. of this point it is irregular, following in greater part the median line of the Great Lakes (Superior, Huron, Erie, and Ontario) and the St. Lawrence River, which latter it leaves at the 45th parallel of latitude. This parallel forms the northern frontier of the states of New York and Vermont. In the extreme NE. one-half of Maine projects into Canada, reaching nearly to the parallel of 47° 30′, and abuts against New Brunswick. The northernmost point of the boundary is on the Lake of the Woods, in lat. 49° 24′ N. In the SE. the peninsula of Florida projects nearly 400 miles towards Cuba, washed by the Atlantic on the E. and by the Gulf of Mexico on the W. and SW., with the connecting Strait of Florida washing its S. extremity. The other states bordering on the Gulf of Mexico are Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, the last-named extending along the NW. and W. shore for upward of 375 miles to a point at the mouth of the Rio Grande, which river forms the boundary with Mexico as far as El Paso, in about lon. 106° 25′ W. The southernmost point of the main-land is the extremity of the peninsula of Florida (Cape Sable), in lat. 25° 10′ N. The country thus lies entirely outside of the tropics. Its easternmost point is the E. extremity of Washington co., Me., near Eastport, in lon. 66° 58′ W.; the westernmost point is Cape Flattery, the NW. extremity of the state of Washington, in lon. 124° 36′ W. The length near the 42d parallel of latitude is about 2800 miles, and the maximum width, measured from the N. extremity of Minnesota to the S. extremity of Texas, is about 1600 miles. In the far NW. Alaska approaches to within about 54 miles of the mainland of Asia (Kamtchatka), and carries the territorial domain, in Point Barrow, to lat. 71° 23′ N., and insularly, in the westernmost of the (American) Aleutian Islands (Attu Island), to lon. 187° 34′ W. (For an extended account of this portion of the national domain, see ALASKA.) The recently acquired insular possessions comprise Porto Rico, the Philippines, Hawaii, Guam (in the Ladrones), and part of the Samoan Islands. In addition a number of small, uninhabited guano islets of the central Pacific Ocean, in the Phœnix and Manihiki archipelagoes,—the "American Polynesia,"—have carried or carry the American flag.

Area and Population.—The land-area of the United States proper is 2,970,000 sq. m. The appertaining waters have an area of about 55,000 sq. m. The area of Alaska is about 570,000 sq. m. The insular possessions have a land area of about 125,000 sq. m., of which about 115,000 sq. m. belong to the Philippines, 6000 (approximately) to Hawaii, and 3600 to Porto Rico. The total area of the domain of the United States is, therefore, in round numbers 3,700,000 sq. m. The population of the United States (Indians on reservations or untaxed not included) in 1790 was 3,929,214; in 1800, 5,308,483; in 1810, 7,239,881; in 1820, 9,638,453; in 1830, 12,866,020; in 1840, 17,069,453; in 1850, 23,191,876; in 1860, 31,443,321; in 1870 (Alaska and Indian Territory not included), 38,558,371; in 1880 (Alaska included, Indian Territory excluded), 50,189,209; in 1890, 62,799,588. The population in 1890, inclusive of the Indian Territory, was 62,979,770. The population of the United States proper and Alaska in 1900, the date of the last federal census, was 76,149,366 (including soldiers and others abroad to the number of 91,219). The population of the Hawaiian Islands in that year was 154,001. The population of the United States in 1900, not reckoning the possessions acquired from Spain (and Samoa), was, therefore, 76,303,387. Calculating upon the basis of the increase in the period 1890–1900 and taking account of the enormous increase in the immigration since 1900, we may set down the population at the present time (close of 1905) at approximately 85,000,000. The population of Porto Rico in 1899 was 953,243; that of the Philippine Islands in 1903, according to the census then taken, 7,635,426. The inhabitants of the United States and its dependencies may, therefore, be estimated to number not far from 94,000,000.

The negro population of the United States at the various federal censuses has been as follows: 1790, 757,208; 1800, 1,002,037; 1810, 1,377,808; 1820, 1,771,656; 1830, 2,328,642; 1840, 2,873,648; 1850, 3,638,808; 1860, 4,441,830; 1870, 4,880,009; 1880, 6,580,793; 1890, 7,488,788; 1900, 8,840,789. It may be set down now (close of 1905) at between 9,500,000 and 10,000,000. Nearly the entire negro population of the United States is found in the region bounded on the E. by the Atlantic Ocean, on the S. by the Gulf of Mexico, on the W. by the meridian of 98° W. lon. (passing through the middle of Texas), and on the N. by a line drawn from the Atlantic coast at New York city through Cincinnati to the above-mentioned meridian. Within this area are included the so-called Southern states (with the exception of the western half of Texas), the District of Columbia, the Indian Territory, southern Missouri, and portions of several other states. The 4 states having the largest negro population in 1900 were Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, and South Carolina, with over 750,000 each, Georgia leading with 1,034,800. Next follow in order Virginia, Louisiana, North Carolina, and Texas (the numbers ranging from 660,000 to 620,000). Then come Tennessee, Arkansas, Kentucky, Maryland, and Florida (480,000 to 230,000). In Mississippi and South Carolina the negroes outnumber the whites. The members of the African race are nearly all descendants of slaves. The seat of the slave-trade in Africa was mainly the intertropical part of the W. coast, but many slaves were at one time brought from eastern Africa, and even from Madagascar, where the native population is largely of Malayan stock. The American negro race is, therefore, of a very complex origin, although probably the Mandingo element is most largely represented. There are about 250,000 Indians in the United States exclusive of Alaska.

The following is a table of the areas and populations (1850, 1890, 1900) of the states and territories of the United States proper:

The foreign-born population of the United States in 1900 was 10,460,000. The countries (or regions) of nativity (omitting those represented by less than 50,000 persons) were: Germany, 2,667,000; Ireland, 1,618,500; Canada and Newfoundland, 1,181,000; England, 842,000; Sweden, 573,000; Italy, 484,000; Russia proper (mainly Jews), 424,000; Poland (Russian Poland, Prussian province of Posen, Austrian province of Galicia, etc.), 383,000 (largely Jews); Norway, 337,000; Cisleithan Austria (exclusive of Bohemia, Galicia, etc.), 276,000; Scotland, 234,000; Bohemia, 157,000; Denmark, 154,000; Hungary, 146,000 (Slovaks, Magyars, Jews); Switzerland, 116,000; the Netherlands, 105,000; France, 104,000; Mexico, 103,000; Wales, 94,000; China, 82,000. By far the greater part of the original European settlers of the United States came from the British Isles. In spite of the prodigious immigration from the continent of Europe in the last hundred years, there is hardly a corner of the country in which English is not the prevailing language. In some districts in Pennsylvania a considerable number of people still use a German dialect, commonly known as Pennsylvania Dutch, closely kindred to that of the upper Rhine districts. The French tongue is the language of many people in Louisiana, and the Spanish language is spoken in parts of New Mexico, Arizona, and the adjacent regions. The later European immigration has been very largely of Irish, Germans, English, Canadians, Bohemians, Scandinavians, Jews, Italians, Poles, and Slovaks. In recent years the largest contingents of immigrants have been furnished by Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Russia. The Scandinavian element is particularly strong in the northern part of the Mississippi Valley, and the Slovak in the mining districts of the Middle Atlantic states. The tide of immigration did not assume great dimensions until 1830. It has reached an unprecedented height since 1900, the annual number of arrivals having for some years exceeded 800,000. Free immigration is permitted to all peoples and nations except the Chinese, but the importation of hands to fill contract labor is prohibited, as well as the landing of paupers.

There are no accurate statistics regarding religion in the United States. The great bulk of the population is Protestant. The Catholics are largely represented by the inhabitants of Irish birth or extraction, the Canadians, the people of South German origin, and by the Italian, Bohemian, Polish, Slovak, French, and Mexican elements in the population. The largest Protestant sects are the Methodists and Baptists. Other numerous ones are the Lutherans, Presbyterians, Disciples of Christ, Episcopalians, and Congregationalists. The population belonging to the Jewish religion exceeds 1,000,000.

At the time of the foundation of the republic the United States comprised 13 states: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia. They were commonly divided into 3 groups: the New England states, comprising the first 4; the Middle states, comprising the second 4; and the Southern states, comprising the last 5. The number of the New England states was subsequently increased to 6 by the admission of Vermont and Maine. The number of Southern states (a designation still in use) was increased by the admission of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Texas, and West Virginia. Missouri is often included among the Southern states. The designation Middle states in the original sense continued in use until within recent years. It was customary until a comparatively recent time to speak of the states east of the Rocky Mountains not included within these three groups as the Western states. At the present time the states and territories of the United States are officially grouped under 5 divisions: North Atlantic Division, South Atlantic Division, North Central Division, South Central Division, Western Division. The number of states that have been admitted into the Union under the constitution is 32, the first having been Vermont (1791) and the last Utah (1896).

The following cities had a population exceeding 100,000 in 1900:

New York	3,437,000	Providence	175,500
Chicago	1,698,500	Indianapolis	169,000
Philadelphia	1,294,000	Kansas City, Mo	164,000
St. Louis	575,000	St. Paul	164,000
Boston	561,000	Rochester	162,000
Baltimore	509,000	Denver	139,000
Cleveland	382,000	Toledo	132,000
Buffalo	352,000	Allegheny	130,000
San Francisco	343,000	Columbus	125,500
Cincinnati	326,000	Worcester	118,000
Pittsburg	322,000	Syracuse	108,000
New Orleans	287,000	New Haven	108,000
Detroit	286,000	Paterson	105,000
Milwaukee	285,000	Fall River	105,000
Washington	279,000	St. Joseph	103,000
Newark	246,000	Omaha	102,500
Jersey City	206,000	Los Angeles	102,000
Louisville	205,000	Memphis	102,000
Minneapolis	203,000	Scranton	102,000

Physical Characteristics.—Extending from the parallel of 25° N. of the equator to 49° and from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific, the United States possesses a great diversity of physical aspects, soil, and climate. The country may be conveniently, even if not physiographically, divided into three parts by the Mississippi River and by the Rocky Mountains, the former rising in Minnesota, not far S. of the N. boundary, and flowing southward to the Gulf of Mexico, and the latter extending across the greater part of the territory from New Mexico to Canada, and continuing through that region to (or near to) the Arctic Ocean. The valley of the Mississippi in its N. portion, on both sides of the river, has prairie characteristics, being in some parts quite level, but generally rolling; S. of the Missouri on the W. and of the Ohio on the E. the surface is somewhat more varied. There are numerous hilly tracts, while the level reaches are often swampy near the large rivers. The region was formerly liberally timbered, and considerable woodland still remains, but the site of the ancient forest is now largely occupied by agricultural and grazing lands. East of the Mississippi Valley, which is sometimes referred to as the Great Central Basin of the United States, and which at St. Louis has an elevation of only 400 feet above the sea, and at St. Paul, at the head of navigation, of 700 ft., extends a band of elevated land, of both plateau and mountain characteristics, which is the Appalachian uplift. It comprises mountains of most ancient and newer construction, whose trend conforms largely to that of the Atlantic coast, and whose extent, in a broken and continuous line, is virtually that from the N. of Maine to Alabama. The highest points of land in the eastern United States are found in the White Mountains of New Hampshire (Mount Washington, 6293 ft.), in the Black Mountains of North Carolina (Black Dome or Mount Mitchell, 6710 ft., the loftiest summit E. of the Rocky Mountains), and in the Unaka (or Smoky) Mountains, on the borders of Tennessee and North Carolina (Mount Guyot and Clingman Dome, each about 6600 ft.). Other prominent points are Mount Katahdin, in Maine, 5200 ft.; Mount Marcy, in New York, 5344 ft.; Mount Mansfield, in Vermont, 4364 ft.; Slide Mountain, in the Catskills, New York, 4205 ft.; and the Peaks of Otter, in Virginia, 4001 ft. (For the relations of the different mountain-ranges see the article AMERICA and the special notices of the Appalachian, Alleghany, White, Adirondack, Green, Catskill, and Black Mountains, the Blue Ridge, etc.)

The Atlantic coast is rather rugged in the NE., with fjord characteristics in Maine, but southward of New York Bay it is mostly low and flat, and made irregular by many more or less extended inlets (Delaware Bay, Chesapeake Bay, Albemarle and Pamlico sounds) and some remarkable peninsular formations. The eastern and southern coasts together form the most extensive range of low and sandy sea-line to be found anywhere. At no point on this line south of Long Island is there an elevation exceeding 350 ft. The Gulf coast is somewhat irregular, with a large number of bays, some quite small, but others large and important; most of them are merely coast-lagoons shut in by sand-spits. Good harbors abound on the Atlantic side, while there are many reefs and keys off the Gulf coast. The Pacific coast is generally high and rocky, with but few safe harbors. The extensive inlet of Puget Sound in the NW. and the Bay of San Francisco are the principal indentations of the Pacific coast-line. Along the New England coast there are a number of coast-islands, of which the largest is Mount Desert in Maine. The largest island on the whole Atlantic coast is Long Island, which belongs to New York. Close to it is Staten Island, which forms part of the city of New York. The "sea-islands," noted for their fine cotton, belong to South Carolina and Georgia, and the Florida Keys and the Dry Tortugas to Florida. Most of the other Atlantic and Gulf islands are wave-formed spits of sand, of which Galveston, Matagorda, Brazos, and Padre islands, in Texas, are among the most notable. Off the Louisiana coast there are many islets, of which we may mention the Chandeleur group; while on the Pacific side are the Santa Barbara and San Juan islands, besides the numerous Alaskan groups.

The eastern division of the country (that E. of the Mississippi) is by far the most populous and wealthy, and includes most of the great manufacturing centres of the land. It is distinguished by the variety of its agricultural products, and contains the great coal-fields and principal iron- and copper-deposits of the country, as well as the chief stores of petroleum. On the northern borders of this division are the Great Lakes (Superior, Huron, Erie, Ontario, and Michigan—the last-named entirely within the domain of the United States) and their outlet, the St. Lawrence River. The principal rivers flowing seaward are the Penobscot, Kennebec, Connecticut, Hudson, Delaware, Susquehanna, Potomac, James, Roanoke, Great Pedee, Santee, Savannah, Altamaha, St. John's, Chattahoochee (with the Apalachicola), Alabama (with the Mobile), and Pearl. The drainage into the Mississippi River is mainly through the Ohio, whose chief tributaries, in addition to its headstreams, the Alleghany and Monongahela, are the Great Kanawha, Scioto, Miami, Kentucky, Wabash, Cumberland, and Tennessee. Among the other streams flowing directly into the Mississippi are the Wisconsin, Illinois, and Yazoo.

The second or middle division of the United States, which extends westward from the Mississippi River to the Rocky Mountains and includes their eastern ranges, or those whose off-flow is directed to the Atlantic basin, comprises one of the best farming-regions of the world, while a considerable part of what is not capable of yielding large returns to the husbandman offers the miner rich stores of gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc, and other valuable minerals. A fair quality of coal is abundant in some localities, and rich petroleum-wells have been recently opened in various places. The advantages of this division, in which are included the Great Plains, vast expanses of grass and steppe-country which rise gradually from the E. westward and attain elevations of 5000 and 6000 feet, are materially enhanced by a generally delightful and salubrious climate. The cold of the Dakotas and Montana, as well as the heat of New Mexico and Texas, is rendered tolerable by the dryness of the atmosphere. Though still sparsely inhabited, this section is rapidly growing in population. Proceeding from the Mississippi Valley westward, indications are soon observed of the proximity of the Rocky Mountain system, though Nebraska and Kansas, and even the Dakotas and Texas in great part, are rather level, with such slight elevations and depressions as characterize a prairie country. The SW. part of Texas, the greater part of New Mexico and Colorado, nearly all of Wyoming, a large part of Idaho, and the W. part of Montana are occupied by the main ranges of the Rocky Mountains with the great valleys and cañons and the numerous spurs and chains of that vast system. In this section are located many of the loftiest and most famous summits of the national domain: Blanca Peak, in the Sangre de Cristo Mountains, Colorado, 14,464 (14,390) ft. (the culminating point of the Rocky Mountain system); Pike's Peak, in the Front Range of Colorado, 14,108 ft.; Long's Peak, 14,271 ft.; Mountain of the Holy Cross, 14,006 ft.; the volcanic Spanish Peaks, etc. (For a detailed account of the mountain-system of this region see ROCKY MOUNTAINS.) This median division of the United States is drained by many large rivers, among which, in addition to the Mississippi, are the Rio Grande, on the SW. boundary; the Missouri (with its important tributaries, the Maria's, Milk, Yellowstone, Little Missouri, Cheyenne, Dakota, or James, Niobrara, Big Sioux, Platte, Kansas, and Osage), the Arkansas, and the Red, the three great western affluents of the Mississippi; the Sabine (and its affluent the Neches), the Trinity, the Brazos, and the Colorado of Texas, flowing into the Gulf of Mexico; the Pecos, flowing into the Rio Grande; and the Red River of the North, which forms part of the boundary between North Dakota and Minnesota, and flows N. into Canada, discharging into Lake Winnipeg.

The third or western division includes the states and territories of the Pacific slope. With the exception of Camas Prairie in Idaho and a number of less extended prairie-tracts, the surface is more or less mountainous throughout, with numerous elevated plateaus, some of them of vast extent. This division presents a variety of soil and climate as great as can be found in the same extent of territory in any other part of the world. The soil in some parts is more exuberantly productive than anywhere else in the temperate zone. Vast regions are a desert for lack of rain. There is no more healthful region upon the globe. In the possession of mineral wealth, including gold, silver, copper, lead, quicksilver, etc., the Pacific slope is unrivalled. Besides the Rocky Mountains and the spurs and chains belonging to their system, there are many separate, some quite isolated, mountain ranges, and an extensive mountain-system (the Coast Range) near the coast. The Sierra Nevada, which occupies much of the eastern portion of the state of California, and is irregularly continued as the Cascade Mountains through Oregon and Washington,—constructively a much more ancient mountain-system than the Rocky Mountains proper,—culminates in Mount Whitney, probably the loftiest elevation of the United States proper, 15,013 (14,898) feet. This summit is, however, vastly overtopped by the giants of Alaska,—Mount St. Elias, 18,026 ft., and Mount McKinley, 20,464 ft.,—just as the great volcanic peaks of California, Oregon, and Washington—Shasta, 14,442 ft.; Hood, 11,225 (11,934) ft.; Rainier (or Tacoma), 14,526 ft.; Baker, in eruption as late as 1870, 10,827 ft.—are seemingly overtopped by Wrangel, 17,500 (?) ft., in the Copper River region of Alaska. The Salmon River Mountains, stretching WNW. from the Rocky Mountains to the boundary of Idaho and Oregon, nearly connect with the Blue Mountains, which lie considerably eastward of the Cascade system. In Nevada and Utah the Humboldt ranges, the Wasatch Mountains, and many minor lines of mountains trend N. and S., not generally connecting directly with either of the greater mountain systems. They define or lie within what is known as the Great Basin, a vast area of interior drainage, containing the Great Salt Lake, the relict of a much more extensive lake of a past period, known to geologists as Lake Bonneville, which had a depth of not less than 1000 ft. Other bodies of water without outlet occupy parts of this same inhospitable and largely arid region. The Olympic Mountains of Washington are properly a continuation of the more southerly Coast Range.

Among the more distinctive physiographic and scenic features of the Pacific region are the lofty plateaus of Arizona and Utah, 7000–9000 feet or more in elevation; the deeply-incised cañon of the Colorado River; the great volcanic plateaus of the Columbia and Snake rivers; the trough of the Yosemite Valley; and a portion of the geyser region of the Yellowstone.

Among the great rivers of this division the chief are the Colorado (with its head-streams, the Grand and Green, and its tributaries, the San Juan, Little Colorado, Virgin, and Gila), San Joaquin, Sacramento, Klamath, and Columbia (with its affluents, Clarks Fork, Okanagon, Snake, and Willamette). The Columbia River is, with the exception of the Yukon River of Alaska and Canada, the largest river of the American continent discharging into the Pacific Ocean. The Great Salt Lake, Utah, is the largest body of water in this division. At the NW. corner, Puget Sound, with Admiralty Inlet, a deep open channel connecting it with the Strait of Juan de Fuca and through this with the Pacific, is an important body of water, affording Washington commercial facilities of an exceptional character.

The greatest exposed depression of the United States is found in SE. California, in the region designated the Mohave (or California) Desert, where a portion of the surface sinks to about 260 feet below sea-level.

Geology.—The broader geological features of the United States have been indicated in the consideration of the geology of North America (see AMERICA), and it only remains here to refer to a few of the more distinctive phases which illumine its physiographic relations. Thus, in a superficial survey, one may enumerate: the coastal plain of the Atlantic and Gulf borders, constructed of seawardly-sloping Cretaceous, Tertiary, and Post-Tertiary deposits; the highly convoluted system of Paleozoic rocks, and the more ancient Archæan series, which built up the Appalachian mountain-ridges, as well as their outer borders and their inner plateaus, with the vast coal- and oil-fields and areas of natural gas; the central (or Mississippi) basin, also in great part with a Paleozoic floor, containing coal and gas, and with the rock-masses occupying over large areas nearly horizontal positions; the Great Plains, occupying in part the position of an internal sea which in the Cretaceous period swept up from the Gulf of Mexico nearly or quite to the Arctic Ocean; the large lacustrine areas, of Tertiary age, which adjoin these, and are remarkable for the wealth of fossil-remains which they have disclosed; the Rocky Mountain uplift, accomplished in its different stages in the Cretaceous and Tertiary periods; the great Tertiary plateaus of the SW., in which the Colorado and other streams have incised their profound channels; the Great Basin, with the remains of its vast Quaternary lake-basins (Bonneville, Lahontan); the Tertiary volcanic plateaus of the Columbia and Snake rivers; the volcanic tracts of the W. and SW.; the Jurassic core of the Sierra Nevada; and the Tertiary Coast Range. Extensive glacial deposits cover much of the region N. of the 36th parallel of latitude and E. of the Mississippi River.

The mineral resources of the United States are enormous and comprise most of the economic products that are found anywhere. With the exception of coal, oil, natural gas, and iron, which have a very large development in the Appalachian region and in the basin region lying to the W., and of the copper and iron deposits of the Lake Superior region of Michigan and Minnesota, most of the mineral wealth is centred in the Rocky Mountain region and in the states and territories of the Pacific slope. Colorado, California, Montana, and Nevada lead in the production of the precious metals, but there is probably no extensive area traversed by the western mountains which is not metalliferous to the extent of being economically important. The area of the coal-bearing strata of the United States is estimated to be about 300,000 sq. m., of which the Appalachian region comprises upward of 60,000 sq. m. Important deposits of lignitic coal occur along the eastern foot of the Rocky Mountains and also among the Pacific coast ranges. (See paragraph under Mineral Wealth.)

An interesting feature in the geology of the United States is furnished by the large numbers of vertebrate remains, of generalized and specialized types, which appear in deposits from nearly the most ancient to the Post-Tertiary, and many of which throw a most important light upon the doctrine of descent and the origination of particular forms. Among such may be mentioned the theriomorph reptiles of the Permian period; the gigantic dinosaurs of the Jurassic and Cretaceous deposits (Brontosaurus, Atlantosaurus, Mosasaurus, Hadrosaurus, Stegosaurus, Elasmosaurus); the Cretaceous flying reptiles (pterodactyls); toothed birds of the same era; and the numerous mammalian types of the Tertiary and later period, many of which (Coryphodon, Brontotherium, Uintatherium, Titanotherium, etc.) have seemingly left no modern descendants, while others clearly establish the life-histories of certain groups and the lines of descent of individual types (e.g., Eohippus, Orohippus, Miohippus, Pliohippus, in the pedigree of the horse). The late-Tertiary and Post-Tertiary deposits have yielded the remains of giant edentates (Mylodon, Megalonyx, Megatherium, Morotherium, Glyptodon), whose nearest allies are probably to be sought among the recent edentate types of the South American continent. The mammoth and mastodon were both comparatively recent inhabitants of the region of the United States. Ancient or fossilized remains of man have also been found (California, Florida, etc.), but the degree of their antiquity has not yet been fully established.

Scenic and Topographic Aspects.—Owing to its vast continental extent and as a result of the manifold types of geological activity which have shaped the structural features of the country, the United States presents a variety of scenery and topographic aspect which is not to be matched in any country of the world. In its almost boundless extent of valley and plain, in the magnitude of its traversing mountains, the expanse of its lake-basins, the length and activity of its major water-courses, the profundity of its water-worn cañons and gorges, the vastness of its lava-fields and the majesty of its still somnolent volcanoes, and the wondrous phenomena of geyser eruptions, the region presents a combination of physiognomic aspect the elements of which are elsewhere to be found only in several continents. The Niagara Falls have seemingly their only rival in the Victoria Falls of the Zambezi, in southern Africa; the geysers, sinter terraces, and hot springs of the Yellowstone National Park, their only counterpart in the "Hot Springs" and geyser region of North Island, New Zealand. The trap sheets of the Deccan, in India, can alone be compared with the great volcanic plateau of the Columbia and Snake River regions, while for the Great Lakes a comparison must be sought in the large equatorial and subequatorial basins which lie about the source of the Nile in Africa. The gorge (or Grand Cañon) of the Colorado, a river channel trenched for two hundred miles or more to a depth of thousands of feet, is a unique feature of the globe, and is not even faintly approached by the gorges of the Indus and Brahmaputra through the Himalayas. The majestic cones of Shasta and Rainier vie in sublimity with Fujiyama of Japan, Orizaba of Mexico, and Ararat of Armenia. The romantic beauty of the Hudson River has justly been compared with that of the Rhine, —the panorama of the Golden Gate with the Bay of Naples. The western United States shares with Central Asia the claim of having the largest extent of elevated plateau, and in the Mississippi basin the country has the largest continuous expanse of cultivated territory on the globe. A minor desert tract, with desert characteristics as well emphasized as in the Sahara or Gobi, occupies a part of southeastern California and some of the adjacent region in Nevada.

With all this variety in its nature, it is yet significant that the United States lacks many of those striking features in its landscape which mark grandeur of scenery elsewhere. Its more massive mountains, the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada, despite their numerous peaks rising to 14,000 feet and more, lack, except in localized areas, the distinctive characteristics of the Alps of Europe. The Yosemite Valley, with its wonderful El Capitan and the titanic walls that enclose its chasm, may claim comparison with the valley of Lauterbrunnen; the buttress of Mount Whitney may be likened to some of the walls of the Dolomites, and the serrated summits of the Saguache Range to the deeply-incised summit lines of the Alps and Pyrenees; but these exceptional resemblances only emphasize the distinctness in character which is so apparent to the student of form and color. Barring one or two fairly large ice-fields on the upper slopes of Mount Rainier, there are no glaciers of first (one might almost say, of second or third) magnitude in the United States proper, and the snow-covering, even on the higher mountain slopes, is generally so light that a number of the summits, rising upward of 14,000 feet (such as Pike's Peak), are virtually destitute of a snow-cap during a considerable or even the greater part of the summer months.

The eastern mountains of the United States, the Appalachians, from Maine to Alabama, present hardly more than peaceful, even if very beautiful, scenery. Rising in their highest points (the Black and Unaka mountains of North Carolina and Tennessee and the White Mountains of New Hampshire), hardly more than 600–1000 feet above the crest of the Jura Mountains, they suggest much in their scenery that belongs to these mountains and to the neighboring Black Forest of Baden. The charms of the landscape in parts of the northeastern United States, especially in northern New York (Adirondack region) and the central and northern parts of Maine, are enhanced by a multitude of lakes whose origin is to be traced to the ice of the Glacial Period; but these lakes are not of the Alpine type, deep and crystal, with ice-clad pinnacles towering above them, but of the subdued character which reminds one more of Windermere, Lomond, Katrine, and other British lakes. Perhaps no lake of Europe lying entirely outside of the Alpine zone and without the boundaries of the Scandinavian peninsula, can compare in beauty with Lake George. Lake Tahoe, on the borders of California and Nevada, is virtually the only lake in the national domain which has a truly Alpine setting.

No sketch of the scenery of the United States could be considered complete without some reference to the physiognomic aspect that is impressed upon it by its vegetal covering,—by the great expanse of deciduous forest that clothes the eastern mountains and the lowlands adjacent to them, the sombre forest of pine, spruce, and hemlock that still forms part of the "North Woods," the forest of the so-called cypress-swamps and of the almost innumerable palmettoes in southern Florida, the waving grass- and flower-land of the prairie regions, the open "woodland" of dreary cactus and yucca that brings the landscape of Mexico into Arizona and New Mexico, the sage and mesquite of much of the western table-land, and lastly the "groves" of sequoias and redwoods of the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range of California, whose giants, attaining a height of from 250 to 325 feet, are rivalled (and probably surpassed) only by the eucalyptus or blue-gum of the Australian region.

Flora.—The irregularity of isothermal lines in the United States, in connection with the diversity of soils, not only makes it impossible to designate localities adapted to the various branches of agriculture by parallels of latitude and meridians of longitude, but also occasions a certain irregularity in the distribution of the indigenous flora and fauna, although, considering the great area of the country E. of the Rocky Mountains, the comparative uniformity of its native fauna and flora is remarkable. Many of the plant-species of the Atlantic region are remarkable for an extensive north-and-south range, notwithstanding diversities of climate. The Pacific slope has a distinctly characteristic flora. That of the E. has many eastern Asiatic and some western European analogies. In general terms it may be stated that the flora of the United States comprises nearly all the orders and species of North America; and the plant-life of the country has been considerably enriched by the naturalization of adventitious species. Probably no other country of the temperate zones has a native flora more rich and varied, unless we except eastern Asia, where there are many errant species of tropical type. This admixture of southern plant-forms has been checked in North America by the highlands of Mexico and by the great southern Gulf, which have hindered the northward migration of southern types. The flora of the Pacific slope includes trees and plants of the greatest variety, from those of tropical or semitropical character and habit to those of cold-temperate latitudes, and among them are a number of species and some entire genera peculiar to this part of the globe. Its birches, buckeye, buttonwood, cherry, chestnut, maples, oaks, willows, etc., are quite distinct species, and its coniferous trees (Lambert's pine, Douglas's spruce, silver fir) are noted for a size which makes them distinguishable from those of other regions, while the California sequoias, the California laurel, the strawberry-tree (madroño), and the superb Menzies arbutus cannot be classed in the genera met with in other parts of the country. The Sequoia gigantea (or sequoia proper), which has its home among the Sierra Nevada, and the Sequoia sempervirens (or redwood), of the Coast Range, both attain a height of 300 feet and more. The flora of the South Atlantic region includes species of many northern trees, and a considerable number of distinct trees, of which the more remarkable are the Osage orange, Georgia bark, devilwood, catalpa, sorrel, wild China, and cabbage palmetto. Of the southern species one of the most valuable is the well-known live-oak, prized for ship-timber, and there are numerous important pines and some rarely beautiful magnolias. The region from Virginia and Kentucky northward, and east of the Mississippi, has a great number of trees not uncommon in Europe, but many of its ashes, birches, elms, maples, oaks, pines, and others, though of the same genera as trees of these designations in Europe, are of distinct species, while there are a goodly number of trees not found in Europe, as the buckeye, hickories, locusts, magnolias, sassafras, tulip, tupelo, etc. Among the smaller flora, the buffalo berry, laurel (shrub), leatherwood, pawpaw, spice-bush, witch-hazel, and some others are distinctively American, and there are many of the more desirable plants of Europe, the azaleas, blackberries, dogwoods, rhododendrons, sumachs, whortleberries, etc. The flora of southern Florida is closely related to that of the West Indies, but the area of this subtropical flora, with its palmettoes and wild-figs, and the cultivated areas of cocoanut and pine-apple, is small. The intrusion of these southern forms may be recent. There are considerable tracts within the Rocky Mountain system where the alkaline nature of the soil forbids the growth of vegetation, and here only the "sage-bush," the "grease-wood," a few other chenopods, and a few sedges and grasses, are found. But in the vast prairies, where trees are unknown, except along the margins of the streams, the soil is exceedingly rich and productive and the natural growth of grass is luxuriant.

The forest regions of the country comprise a northern belt of pines, in which the white pine (Pinus strobus), one of the noblest and most valuable of American trees, has naturally a very prominent place, as well as the spruce, hemlock, yellow cedar, hackmatack or larch, linden or basswood, black and white ash, and sugar- and other maples, besides birch and elm in several species. Farther south range the hickories and oaks, also the chestnut, tulip-tree, sassafras, cherry, magnolia, walnut, red cedar, tupelo, persimmon, plane, poplar, beech, catalpa, and other valuable timber-trees, some of them found as far S. as the Gulf of Mexico. Characteristic trees of the southern coast-regions are the long-leaved pine, other species of hard or pitch pine, live-oak, palmetto, and various deciduous trees, among which may be classed the valuable deciduous cypress (Taxodium). The Alleghany Mountains are generally covered with rich and beautiful forests, northern and southern types commingling in great profusion. The lower Mississippi region and the vicinity of the Red River in its lower course are rich in forest-species. The prairies E. of the Mississippi, where not undergoing cultivation, are largely encroached upon by woodland. The plains E. of the Rocky Mountains have naturally only a few cottonwood-poplars, willows, elms, box-elders, and hackberries, chiefly along the streams; but the planting of forests in parts of this region has succeeded far beyond expectation. Far to the S. occur the Cross-Timbers, extensive ranges of low oak forest. The tough and gnarled mesquite is a characteristic tree throughout a large district in Texas. W. of the Rio Grande occur several strictly local arborescent species. The Pacific forest region may be regarded as extending eastward throughout the greater part of the Cordilleran mountain-system. Here the rainfall, except in a limited part of the coast-country, is so deficient that vegetation of all kinds has been singularly modified both in the character of its growth and in the species of which it is composed. Throughout this region the scarcity of hard-wood timber has been seriously felt by the settler. From Puget Sound southward for many miles along the coast an abundant rainfall has caused the growth of a marvellously dense and very lofty forest where, as almost everywhere else in this region, the prevailing growth is made up of coniferous trees. The tallest masts and finest spars known to modern commerce are shipped from this coast. The same forest, extending northward through British Columbia, is found on the islands and main-land of southeastern Alaska, where there is a large amount of timber of good quality. The Pacific coast affords to commerce the highly valuable yellow cedar and red-wood, as well as great quantities of pine and fir spars and lumber. The commercial supply of white pine formerly came chiefly from the northeastern part of the country, especially Pennsylvania and Maine, but for some years it has been largely drawn from the central tier of northern states,—Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. Yellow and other hard pines are cut to a great extent in the Southern Atlantic states, in which region they afford vast amounts of tar, turpentine-oil, rosin, and other similar products, known collectively as "naval stores." Oak, hickory, ash, elm, black walnut, cherry, and other valuable hard woods are cut in almost every part of the eastern half of the country. Spruce and hemlock, birch, beech, and maple are shipped chiefly from the northeastern section, but hemlock and beech abound in parts of the Appalachian region far to the southward. In many rural districts the forests supply the principal fuel used. Peat is also locally employed; and in some of the treeless districts hay, straw, and flax are burned for domestic heating, several ingenious inventions having rendered such unpromising materials very useful for this purpose. The stripping of the country of its noble forests has probably had an unfavorable effect upon the water-supply in some regions, for there can be no reasonable doubt that a dense forest-growth prolongs the storage of water in the earth, and thus tends to prevent river-floods and droughts.

Animals.—The fauna of the United States is also very comprehensive, including many species found in other lands, some distinctively American species of genera found elsewhere, and a few essentially American genera. Among the native animals are the bison (or buffalo), now nearly extinct, the Rocky Mountain sheep, the so-called Rocky Mountain goat (a goat-like antelope), the prong-horn antelope (the only known antelope with deciduous and forked horns), the moose (or true elk), the caribou (or reindeer), several other species of deer, several species or varieties of bear (including the grizzly bear), the raccoon, cougar (panther or American lion), ocelot (in the SW.), lynx, wolves, foxes of several species, the weasel, marten, skunk, polecat, otter, mink, beaver, muskrat, woodchuck, prairie-dog, sewellel, various species of hare, a porcupine, numerous squirrels and gophers, the opossum, armadillo (Texas), and a large number of destructive animals of the rat and mouse family. The jaguar has been found in southern Texas, while the range of the peccary formerly extended to Arkansas. Among birds are the wild turkey, grouse of several kinds, cranes and herons, a number of species of the pigeon family, the mocking-bird, parrot, several species of humming-bird, many song-thrushes, and other small birds (sparrows, warblers, flycatchers) in great variety, besides many kinds of eagle, falcon, and owl, also buzzard-vultures, flamingoes, ibises, geese, ducks, swans, and other game-birds and water-fowl of many species.

The reptile forms are largely represented, both in individuals and in specific types, and include the alligator, in the southern waters; a true crocodile on the SE. coast of Florida; the poisonous "Gila monster" (or lizard); the horned-toads of the arid regions of the SW.; green lizard (or "chameleon") of Florida; the venomous rattlesnakes, moccasins, and copperheads, and a host of tailed and tailless amphibians (newts, sirens, etc.). The oyster is found more abundantly on the Atlantic coast than in any other part of the world. Among crustaceans, the lobster occupies the first place: it is of a species quite distinct from the European kinds.

The fauna of the United States constitutes a part of the Holarctic division of zoögeographers (the Nearctic of an earlier classification), and is thus most intimately connected with that of temperate Eurasia. Parts of Arizona, New Mexico, California, and Texas, and the southern apex of Florida have characteristics which unite or ally their faunas with the faunas of tropical America, and thus form a transition tract.

Climate.—In consequence of the great extent of its territory from S. to N., comprising more than twenty-four degrees of latitude, the United States has a great diversity of climate. A remarkable irregularity in the trend of the isothermal lines makes it impossible to give a general and yet definite description of the climate, rainfall, velocity of the winds, or health-lines of the several sections of the country. This irregularity is due to various natural causes, the direct influence of each of which can be understood with some exactness. Among the chief of these are (1) the two great mountain-systems crossing the country from S. to N., not in a direct line, but diverging considerably in the central zone, the Rocky Mountains to the NW., the Appalachians to the NE., with numerous spurs and branching chains, especially in the former system; (2) only secondary to the great mountains in their influence upon the climate, rainfall, winds, etc., are the great lakes, with the extended expanse of largely level country northwestward to the Arctic regions, affording ready passage to the icy blasts, which are, however, frequently retarded in the directness of their course by the immense bodies of water breaking the land into islands and peninsulas of most uneven and indirect lines. In the S. is a more direct, though not so wide, entrance for southern winds, and in the channel between the lakes in the N. and the gulf in the S. extends the broad Mississippi Valley, intersected by the valleys of the Arkansas and Missouri in the W. and that of the Ohio in the E., spreading out on both sides into vast prairies. With due caution in understanding the classification as generally, not exactly, accurate, it may be noted that the 100th meridian of W. longitude is a sort of dividing line between two of the climates of the United States, or between two climates of the Atlantic slope. E. of this meridian, the 39th parallel of N. latitude may be assumed to be a sort of centre of temperature, with an annual mean of about 44°, the temperature getting perceptibly lower to the N. and higher to the S. from this line. Between the 100th meridian and the Rocky Mountains the mean temperature of 44° is found much farther N., reaching the region of the upper Missouri. Indeed, the isotherm of 44°, in crossing from the Atlantic to the Rocky Mountains, intersects every parallel from 33° to 45°, while W. of the mountains it sweeps northward so as almost to include the N. extremity of Washington. It is worthy of remark that on the Pacific slope the changes of temperature are much more regular than E. of the mountains, and there is none of the tendency to sudden rise or fall which characterizes many localities on the Atlantic side, especially in the middle belt between the 38th and 42d parallels. In the S. part of California, and in Arizona, the thermometer often indicates a temperature of upward of 100° (perhaps with an absolute extreme of 112°–116° shade temperature in the lower valley of the Colorado and in the region adjoining), but the mean is only 76°, while the equable or nearly constant temperature, with gradual rise and fall, makes the heat tolerable and the climate healthful. From the mean of 76° at the S., the temperature of the Pacific slope varies to that of 44° at the N. In the eastern or Atlantic slope the mean in Florida is also about 76° or 77°, but in the more northerly regions the temperature becomes progressively lower and reaches a mean of 36° or 33°. In the South Atlantic states the heated spells of summer are somewhat longer continued than in the Middle Atlantic, but the thermometer seldom rises above 96°, while in the Middle Atlantic states it rises suddenly to 100° or even above and, staying at that point for but a few hours, at most two or three days, falls as suddenly to a temperate summer heat. In the North Atlantic states the thermometer in winter frequently falls several degrees below zero (absolute extreme of about —18°–23°), and in Minnesota and Dakota actually down to —40°; but such extremes, except when accompanied by strong winds and "blizzard" snows, occasion little inconvenience. The rainfall on the Atlantic slope is generally abundant, but not excessive, and is as a rule equally distributed through the year, varying from about 35–38 inches in the N. to 50 and 58 inches on the Gulf coast. On the Pacific slope, on the other hand, it is periodical, with dry seasons and wet seasons, while within and near the Rocky Mountain system irrigation is very generally requisite to make agriculture remunerative. On the Washington coast the rainfall is in places as high as 80 inches, while in the interior Rocky Mountain region the fall is reduced to 14 inches, and even less. In the region of the California Desert and in Death Valley there may be no rain for years at a time.

Of the climate it may be said that sudden changes of temperature are frequent in nearly all parts of the country,—less so, however, in the extreme south than elsewhere in general, while the greater part of the Pacific coast has a singularly mild and equable climate.

Mineral Wealth.—In the extent and variety of its mineral resources the United States is by far the most favored region in the world. Its vast coal-fields and inexhaustible deposits of iron yield a product larger than that obtained in any other country. It stands foremost in the annual yield of the precious metals (gold and silver combined), the Transvaal Colony being its only rival in the output of gold, and Mexico alone surpassing it in the output of silver. It contributes more than one-half of the world's supply of copper and is the foremost lead-producing country. In its yield of quicksilver it has no rival except Spain. Its stores of petroleum are equalled only by those of Russia. The most productive coal-fields are found in the Appalachian region and the Ohio valley. Most of the coal is of the bituminous kind. Nearly all of the anthracite is the product of a small district in the eastern part of Pennsylvania. The quantity of coal mined in the United States in 1903 was over 350,000,000 short tons, of which 66,500,000 tons was anthracite. Pennsylvania is the great coal-mining state, its product being not much less than that of all the other states combined. Next in order come Illinois, West Virginia, Ohio, and Alabama. The states W. of the Mississippi in which most coal is mined are Iowa and Colorado. The great bulk of the iron mined in the United States comes from the region about Lake Superior. Until a comparatively recent time, Pennsylvania was the great iron-mining state, but its product now is only a small fraction of the total output. Minnesota now occupies the foremost place in the quantity of iron-ore mined. Michigan comes next and Alabama third, Pennsylvania, the chief seat of the iron manufacture, ranking fourth. The quantity of pig-iron produced in the United States in 1903 was in round numbers 20,000,000 short tons, valued at $344,300,000. Colorado ranks first in the production of gold, the richest gold-field of the United States being that of Cripple Creek, and California, which was for many years the leading gold-producing region in the world, now occupies the second position. Much gold is obtained from the Black Hills, on the borders of South Dakota and Wyoming, and from the recently discovered gold-region of Tonopah and Goldfield in Nevada. Utah, Idaho, Arizona, and New Mexico are other gold-producing regions. Gold is also mined in the region of the Appalachian Mountains, in South and North Carolina, and Georgia. Alaska is rich in this metal. The output of gold in the United States (including Alaska) in 1900 was valued at $79,000,000; in 1903, at $73,500,000. Colorado is now the principal silver-producing state in the Union, a position formerly occupied by Nevada, which has fallen to a low rank. Montana, Utah, and Idaho come next in order. The commercial value of the silver mined in 1903 was $30,500,000. The great bulk of the copper mined in the United States is obtained in Montana, Michigan (Lake Superior region), and Arizona. The output in 1903 was 698,000,000 pounds, valued at $91,500,000. Lead is mined chiefly in Idaho, Colorado, Utah, Missouri, Kansas, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin. The output in 1903 was 280,000 short tons, valued at $23,500,000. Zinc is mined chiefly in Kansas, Illinois, and Missouri. The output in 1903 was 159,000 short tons, valued at $16,700,000. Nearly the whole of the quicksilver is obtained in California. The bulk of the petroleum in the United States is yielded by Ohio, West Virginia, Texas, Pennsylvania, California, and Kansas. The United States has vast riches in natural gas, the yield of which in 1903 was valued at nearly $36,000,000. Salt is an important product of the country, the great bulk of the supply coming from Michigan, New York, Kansas, and Ohio. The output in 1903 was 19,000,000 barrels, valued at over $5,000,000. Phosphate rock, used as a fertilizer, is obtained in great quantities in Florida, South Carolina, and Tennessee.

Agriculture.—The United States as a whole is a land of great fertility, and the different soils and climatic conditions to be found over its vast extent lend themselves to the cultivation of all the agricultural products of the temperate zone and to some of those of the subtropical zone. The basin of the Mississippi, with its bottom-lands and its prairie-lands, the Pacific coast-land, and the valley of the Red River of the North, vie with each other in the richness of their soil. The coast-land of the Gulf of Mexico, the region draining into the Great Lakes, the basins of many of the rivers that flow into the Atlantic Ocean, and some of the valleys between the ranges of the Appalachian Mountains are highly productive. There is a large section, however, of the United States which is in great part unfit for cultivation by reason of insufficient rainfall. It comprises most of the region between the eastern base of the Rocky Mountains on the E. and the Sierra Nevada and Cascade mountains on the W. This arid section embraces about one-third of the area of the country. In it are included Arizona, New Mexico, Nevada, Utah, most of Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, and southern California, a large part of Oregon, Idaho, and Texas, and parts of North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas. Wherever irrigation is practicable the soil can generally be made to yield bountiful crops, and numerous districts have been converted by the construction of artificial water-courses (many of which are on a colossal scale) from desert-land into blooming gardens. The area that is capable of being rendered productive in this way constitutes, however, but a small proportion of the total arid section. Most of it is destined to remain unavailable for the cultivation of agricultural products. A large portion of it is capable of affording pasturage to cattle and sheep, vast numbers of which are reared on the plains. There is a great extent of absolute desert.

The two distinctive American crops are Indian corn (maize) and cotton, of each of which the United States produces much more than the rest of the globe combined. The great bulk of the cotton goods manufactured all over the world are made from American cotton. The Indian corn is mostly consumed in the United States, the vast stock-raising industry of the country being largely dependent upon it, and great quantities being consumed in the manufacture of glucose, starch, sugar, and whiskey. The United States is the largest wheat-producing country in the world. Corn, hay, wheat, cotton, and oats constitute the five leading crops of the United States. Indian corn is the leading crop in regard to the money value of the annual product. Cotton and wheat make up the bulk of the agricultural exports of the United States. Among the other leading productions are potatoes, tobacco, sugar, and rice. The United States contains some of the most productive fruit-regions in the world. The bulk of the wheat-crop is raised in the North-Central Division of states. The wheat-fields of the valley of the Red River of the North are unequalled in extent and unsurpassed in productiveness. On the Pacific slope the Great Valley of California is noted for its bountiful wheat-crops. The largest wheat-producing states are Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Kansas, Nebraska, Ohio, California, and Indiana. Comparatively little wheat is now grown in the region E. of the Appalachian Mountains, and in the region bordering on the Gulf of Mexico the dominance of cotton reduces the cultivation of this cereal to small dimensions. The wheat-crop of the United States in 1902 was 670,000,000 bushels; in 1903, 638,000,000; in 1904, 552,000,000. By far the greater part of the product of Indian corn and oats is contributed by the North-Central states. The region which produces the largest crops of wheat is situated too far N. for the cultivation of corn, and the climate of the Pacific coast is not suited to this cereal. The largest crops of corn are raised in Iowa, Illinois, Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, and Indiana. The corn-crop of the United States in 1902 was 2,524,000,000 bushels; in 1903, 2,244,000,000; in 1904, 2,467,000,000. Iowa and Illinois rank foremost in the production of oats. The crop of this cereal in the United States in 1902 was 988,000,000 bushels; in 1903, 784,000,000; in 1904, 895,000,000. Barley is extensively grown in California, Minnesota, Wisconsin and a few other states of the North-Central Division. But little attention is given to rye in the United States as compared with European countries. Buckwheat is an important crop in some states, notably Pennsylvania and New York. Rice is grown in Louisiana, South Carolina, Texas, Georgia, and North Carolina. The cotton-growing region embraces the southeastern section of the United States, extending from the Atlantic Ocean westward (approximately) to the meridian which passes through the middle of Texas. It includes Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina (excluding the mountainous section), and part of Texas, Florida, Virginia, Tennessee, Arkansas, Indian Territory, and Oklahoma. The principal cotton-growing states are Texas, Georgia, Mississippi, and Alabama. The cotton-crop of the United States in 1890 was about 7,500,000 bales; in 1900, about 9,500,000; in 1902, upward of 10,500,000; in 1904, about 13,500,000.

The state of New York takes the lead in the cultivation of potatoes. Sweet potatoes are an important crop in the Southern states. Tobacco is grown extensively in Kentucky, North Carolina, Virginia, Wisconsin, Ohio, Tennessee, South Carolina, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Maryland, and New York. The bulk of the crop is produced in Kentucky, North Carolina, and Virginia. The total product in 1903 exceeded 800,000,000 pounds. The cultivation of the sugar-cane in the United States proper is carried on mainly in Louisiana. The beet-sugar industry has assumed considerable dimensions. Sorghum, chiefly used in the manufacture of molasses or syrup, is extensively grown, mostly in the Mississippi valley. Hops are an important crop in New York and in the region of the Pacific coast. Large quantities of flax are raised, mainly for the seed. The peanut is an important crop in a number of the Southern states. No part of the world produces so great a variety of fruits as the United States. Among the commonest fruits are the apple, pear, cherry, grape, strawberry, blackberry, and raspberry. Peaches grow in great abundance in Georgia and other Southern states, in the region of the Great Lakes, in California, and in Delaware. Colorado produces peaches of superior flavor. California raises great quantities of apricots. The most favored home of the plum is the Pacific coast. The grape grows most luxuriantly in California. The wine produced in the United States comes mostly from that state, Ohio, and New York. California produces subtropical fruits in great profusion. They comprise oranges, lemons, olives, figs, and almonds. The orange and pineapple thrive in Florida.

Live-stock.—The extent of its corn-lands and hay-fields and the boundless grazing-grounds of the prairies and of the plains of the Rocky Mountain region give to the United States an extraordinary wealth in live-stock and enable it to send large quantities of animal food to the markets of the world. Most of the cattle, swine, and horses are reared in the North-Central and South-Central states. In the thinly-peopled regions of the West the rearing of cattle and sheep occupies a more prominent and characteristic position than elsewhere, the vast ranch-properties in the plains and "parks" constituting a striking feature in the rural economy of those sections. By far the greatest cattle-raising state is Texas. Horses and mules are bred in great numbers in Kentucky, Missouri, and the adjoining states. Sheep-breeding is carried on most extensively on the elevated plains of the Rocky Mountain region and on the Pacific slope. This branch of the pastoral industry plays, on the whole, a very subordinate part in the United States. Most of the wool used in the country is imported. Slaughtering and beef- and pork-packing are carried on on a vast scale in Chicago, Cincinnati, Kansas City, St. Joseph, St. Louis, and Peoria.

Fisheries.—The fisheries of the United States are mainly carried on on the Newfoundland and Labrador coasts and near the shores of the eastern provinces of Canada. There are also large and growing fisheries on the Alaskan shores, and the waters of that region are thought to be richer in fish than those of any other part of the world. Local fisheries are carried on on all the sea-coasts. The fisheries of the Great Lakes are also highly important. Salmon is extensively taken in many of the streams of the Pacific slope. The shad and alewife are important anadromous fishes of the rivers of the Atlantic slope. The menhaden-fisheries afford much oil and fish-guano. The whale-fishery, in which American enterprise formerly took the first place, is now comparatively unimportant. The fur-seal and sea-otter are largely captured for their valuable furs, chiefly in the waters of Alaska. Belkovski, in Alaska, is the chief seat of the sea-otter fishery, and the Pribilof Islands, in Bering Sea, of the fur-seal business. Seal furs of excellent quality, but of another species, are also collected, principally by American seamen, in the remote Antarctic tracts.

Manufactures.—The United States has risen to the position of the foremost manufacturing country of the world. With respect to the value of its manufactured products in relation to the number of inhabitants, it is, however, considerably behind Great Britain. There the agricultural interests have shrunk to small dimensions by the side of the manufacturing interests, whereas in the United States the former are still about on a parity with the latter. The manufactures of the United States in the nineteenth century increased at a prodigious rate as compared with the products of the soil, a fact which has been strikingly evidenced in recent years by the changing character of the exports. The supplies of coal and iron (exceeding those of any other quarter of the globe), the wealth of forests, the abundance of water-power, the facilities for transportation offered by lakes, rivers, and oceanic waters, and the overflowing supply of cheap labor due to immigration, combined with the resourcefulness, enterprise, and inventive genius of the people, have been the great factors in the extraordinary development of the country as a seat of manufacturing industry. The great bulk of the manufacturing is carried on in the section E. of the meridian of Kansas City and N. of the Ohio and Potomac rivers. This region includes New England, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and parts of Minnesota, Iowa, and Missouri. In recent years important manufacturing interests have been developed in the central and northeastern parts of the Southern states. This section comprises parts of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee. The Pacific slope has also become the seat of considerable manufacturing activity. The leading manufacturing states are New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Illinois. The United States is one of the foremost countries of the world in the extent of its textile industry. In the value of its cotton manufactures it is second only to Great Britain. New England is the principal seat of the cotton manufacture, Massachusetts taking the lead, with Fall River and Lowell as the chief centres. This industry has in the last quarter of a century assumed large dimensions in the South (North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama). The woollen-industry in its various branches (including the manufacture of carpets and hats) is barely inferior in importance to the cotton-industry. The states which rank foremost in this field are Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Rhode Island. Philadelphia is one of the leading seats of the carpet manufacture in the world. The United States may almost be said to rival France in the extent of the silk manufacture. Its principal seats are New Jersey and Pennsylvania, the most important centre being Paterson. The production of linen in the United States is still very limited, the country drawing the great bulk of its supplies from Europe. The manufacture of knit goods has recently developed to large proportions, New York and Pennsylvania being especially prominent in this field. The value of the product of the various branches of the textile industry in 1900 was $931,500,000. The manufacture of ready-made clothing is carried on most extensively in the state of New York, the product of New York city far exceeding that of any other city in the world. Other prominent centres of this industry are Rochester, Baltimore, Chicago, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and Boston. Troy is noted for the manufacture of shirts and other articles of apparel.

In the production of iron and steel the United States is far in advance of all other countries. The growth of this industry in recent times is unparalleled. The production of steel is between one-third and one-half of the total output of the world. The value of the iron and steel product of Pennsylvania is equal to that of the rest of the United States combined. The Pittsburg district supplies the great bulk of the output. Ohio comes next to Pennsylvania, with Cleveland, Youngstown, and other centres of the industry. Next follow Illinois and Indiana. Foundry and machine-shop products are turned out on a large scale in most of the states in the northern half of the region E. of the Mississippi, Pennsylvania ranking first. The construction of iron and steel ships is carried on most extensively on the Delaware River (at or near Philadelphia, Chester, and Wilmington) and at Cleveland, Newport News, and San Francisco. The battle-ships and armored cruisers are of the most powerful type and many have been built for foreign states. In the construction of great ocean steamers of the swiftest kind the United States still lags behind England and Germany. Nearly all the iron and steel vessels built in the United States are destined for the domestic trade. In the days of wooden ships the American clippers were famed as the most perfect specimens of sailing vessels afloat. Wooden vessels of considerable size are still built in large numbers on the coast of Maine. Nowhere else in the world do iron and steel enter so largely into the construction of buildings as in the United States, and a prodigious quantity of metal is consumed in the construction of bridges and in other engineering work. The immense railroad system necessitates a vast consumption of steel for rails. The most powerful locomotives are those constructed in the United States. Philadelphia possesses the most extensive locomotive-works in the world.

Connecticut is the principal seat of the manufacture of small metallic articles of every kind, including hardware, cutlery, brass- and brittania-wares, needles, pins, and plated-ware. Springfield (Mass.), Hartford and New Haven (Conn.), are noted for their fire-arms. The manufacture of tin-plate has developed within the last two decades from small beginnings into an important industry. The manufacture of rolling stock for railroads is one of the leading industries of the country. Much of the industrial activity of the North-Central states is devoted to the manufacture of carriages and wagons, agricultural implements and machinery, furniture, and household appliances of every kind. An immense amount of capital is invested in the manufacture of automobiles. The manufacture of electrical apparatus and supplies has assumed prodigious dimensions.

In the tanning-industry Pennsylvania is far ahead of any state. Massachusetts leads in the manufacture of boots and shoes, its product in 1900 having been but little short of that of the rest of the country. New York and New Hampshire rank next in importance. The cities of St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Chicago have recently risen to prominence in this branch of industry. The production of rubber boots and shoes has its seat mainly in New England. Paper is made on a larger scale in the United States than in any other country. Most of it is now manufactured from wood pulp, mainly spruce, whole forests being cut down to serve this industry. Pennsylvania, Indiana, and Ohio produce about three-fourths of the glass made in the country. New Jersey (Trenton) and Ohio excel in the manufacture of pottery. Among the industries which have been brought to great perfection in recent times is the manufacture of watch-movements. The American pianos are unsurpassed and American sewing-machines are sent to every part of the globe.

The value of the annual product of the breweries is equivalent to an average of about three dollars per head of the population, and that of the distilleries to not much less than half this figure. New York and Pennsylvania take the lead in the value of the malted product. Among the cities noted for their beer are New York, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Newark (N.J.), and Rochester. Peoria occupies the foremost place in the business of distilling. Wine-making occupies a very subordinate position in the United States as compared with the countries of continental Europe. The industry has its chief seats in California, Ohio, and New York. Among the most prominent centres of the tobacco-industry (in its various branches) are New York, Philadelphia, Rochester, St. Louis, Richmond, Durham (N.C.), Lynchburg, Petersburg, Louisville, Key West, and Tampa, the last two places being famous for the quality of their cigars. Pennsylvania and New York are the leading states in the manufacture of chemicals and drugs. The state of New York leads in sugar-refining, the largest refineries being in Brooklyn (New York city). Pennsylvania is second, with the industry concentrated in great part in Philadelphia. The manufacture of beet-sugar has in recent years grown to large proportions. Minneapolis is the foremost city in the world in the extent of its flour-milling and lumber-cutting industries. Large quantities of naval stores are manufactured in the Southern states.

Internal Transportation.—The rivers of the United States afford a great aggregate of navigable inland waters. The United States was the first country in the world to introduce steam-navigation. Of late the relative importance of this means of transportation has greatly declined, owing to the vast extension of the railroad-system. Transportation by canals, which forms such an important feature in the inland commerce of some other countries, plays a small part in the transportation system of the United States, and in fact many of the canals which have been constructed have been abandoned. The principal one is the Erie Canal, extending from Buffalo on Lake Erie to the Hudson River at Albany, which still carries an immense amount of freight. This water-way, opened in 1825, was an important factor in establishing the commercial supremacy of New York city.

The number of miles of railroad in the United States in 1830 was 23; in 1840, 2818; in 1850, 9021; in 1860, 30,626; in 1870, 52,922; in 1880, 93,262; in 1890, 166,703; in 1900, 194,334. It is now (1905) not far from 220,000 (street railroads not being included in these figures). The mileage of railroads in the United States is equal to that of the whole of Europe and to considerably more than one-third of that of the entire globe. Owing to the great part played by railroads, but little attention has been devoted in the United States to the construction of common roads, with respect to which this country is in a very backward state.

Foreign Commerce.—The foreign trade of the United States is vast, but relatively to the sum of the industrial activity of the country it plays a much less important part than is the case in several of the European states. The exports since the beginning of the twentieth century have averaged annually about $1,450,000,000 and the imports about $970,000,000. In the year ending June 30, 1905, the exports amounted to $1,518,500,000 and the imports to $1,117,500,000. In the preceding year (1903–04) the exports were nearly $1,461,000,000. Excluding foreign products, the amount was $1,435,000,000. The main divisions, according to the official classification, were (in round numbers) as follows: products of agriculture, $853,700,000; of manufactures, $452,500,000; of mines, $46,000,000; of the forests, $69,000,000; of the fisheries, $8,500,000. The most important item in the exports is raw cotton, the shipments of which amounted in value to $371,000,000. The exports of meat and meat products (beef, pork, bacon, hams, lard, etc.), live animals (mainly cattle), and dairy products amounted to $224,000,000. The value of the breadstuffs was $149,000,000; of iron and steel and manufactures of iron and steel, $112,000,000; mineral oils, $79,000,000; lumber and manufactures of wood, $65,500,000; copper and manufactures of copper, $58,000,000; tobacco and manufactures of tobacco, $35,000,000; leather and manufactures of leather, $34,000,000; coal, $28,000,000; agricultural implements, $23,000,000; manufactures of cotton, $22,500,000; fruits, $20,500,000. About two-thirds of the exports go to Europe, and of this the British Isles take about half. In the year 1902–03 the exports to the countries which figure most prominently among the recipients of American products were as follows:

British Isles	$524,700,000	Cuba	$21,750,000
Germany	193,550,000	Japan	21,000,000
British North America	126,000,000	Chinese Empire	18,500,000
Netherlands	78,250,000	Spain	17,500,000
France	77,550,000	Denmark	16,150,000
Belgium	47,100,000	Russia	16,000,000
Mexico	42,200,000	Porto Rico	12,000,000
Italy	35,000,000	Argentine Republic	11,500,000
British Africa	33,750,000	Brazil	10,750,000
British Australasia	32,750,000	British West Indies	10,150,000
		Sweden and Norway	10,150,000

Cotton, cereals, animal products, and live animals make up the bulk of the exports to the British Isles. Cotton constitutes the largest item in the exports to Germany and France. The countries and regions from which the United States imports most largely are Great Britain, Germany, France, Brazil, Cuba, the East Indies, British North America, Japan, and Mexico. Among the leading imports are sugar, coffee, hides and skins, manufactures of cotton, raw and manufactured silk, india-rubber and gutta-percha, chemicals, vegetable fibres and textile grasses and fabrics made of them, wool and woollen stuffs, precious stones, fruits, tin, tobacco and cigars, and leather and leather goods. In the period immediately preceding the Civil War, the United States occupied a position in the carrying trade of the world second only to that of the British Empire. At present it plays a small rôle in this field, and the great bulk of its imports and exports is carried in foreign bottoms.

Government.—The United States is a federal republic composed of self-governing states, each under a republican form of government. The powers of the federal government are defined by a written constitution, all powers not specifically delegated to the United States being reserved to the several states. The constitution of the United States was framed by a convention which assembled in Philadelphia in 1787. The ratification by 9 states, necessary for its adoption, was obtained in the course of that year and the next. The last state to ratify was Rhode Island, in 1790. The first 10 amendments were added almost immediately after the constitution was put into operation. The eleventh amendment followed soon after, and the twelfth amendment was adopted in 1803–04. There was no new amendment until 1865, when the one abolishing slavery was adopted. The fourteenth amendment, whose provisions were mainly directed towards the granting of full civil rights to the negroes, was adopted in Congress in 1866 and became part of the constitution in 1868. The fifteenth amendment, absolutely prohibiting the disfranchisement by the states of persons on account of race or color, was adopted in Congress in 1869, and was proclaimed part of the constitution in 1870. Under the constitution the powers of the federal government are distributed among three departments,—the legislative, executive, and judicial. The national legislature (or Congress) consists of a senate and a house of representatives. In the senate the states as such are represented, each having 2 members. The senators are chosen by the legislatures of the states. Their term is 6 years, one-third of the body retiring every 2 years. In the house of representatives the people of the several states are represented (each member of the house representing a congressional district), the number of representatives from each state being in proportion to its population. In the apportionment made after the census of 1900 the representation in the lower house of Congress was fixed on the basis of 1 member for approximately 194,000 inhabitants. The following table gives the number of representatives from each state in Congress:

Alabama	9	Nevada	1
Arkansas	7	New Hampshire	2
California	8	New Jersey	10
Colorado	3	New York	37
Connecticut	5	North Carolina	10
Delaware	1	North Dakota	2
Florida	3	Ohio	21
Georgia	11	Oregon	2
Idaho	1	Pennsylvania	32
Illinois	25	Rhode Island	2
Indiana	13	South Carolina	7
Iowa	11	South Dakota	2
Kansas	8	Tennessee	10
Kentucky	11	Texas	16
Louisiana	7	Utah	1
Maine	4	Vermont	2
Maryland	6	Virginia	10
Massachusetts	14	Washington	3
Michigan	12	West Virginia	5
Minnesota	9	Wisconsin	11
Mississippi	8	Wyoming	1
Missouri	16
Montana	1
Nebraska	6	Total	386

The representatives are chosen for a term of 2 years, the qualifications for voters being the same in each individual state as the qualifications requisite for the electors of the more numerous branch of the state legislature.

With regard to the enactment of laws the two branches of Congress are in general co-ordinate. Revenue bills, however, must originate in the lower house. The senate passes upon all nominations to office made by the president of the United States. All treaties made with foreign powers require ratification by the senate, a two-thirds vote being necessary. In the impeachment of officers of the United States the house of representatives prefers the impeachment and the trial is by the senate. The house of representatives elects its own speaker, and the vice-president of the United States presides over the senate.

At the head of the executive department of the government is the president, who serves for 4 years. He is chosen by colleges of electors, elected in each state in such manner as the legislature of the state may prescribe. In every state of the Union the electors are now chosen by popular vote. Each state is entitled to as many electors as the number of its representatives and senators in the federal legislature taken together. The election of president has virtually ceased to be indirect, the electors merely registering the popular will. In case no candidate receives a majority of the electoral votes, the house of representatives, voting by states, chooses the president from among the three leading candidates. In case of the death of the president or of his disability, the office devolves upon the vice-president. This officer is chosen by the same electors as the president. The president, in addition to being the administrative head of the government, is commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States and of the militia when called into the service of the federal government. He has a veto power over all acts and joint resolutions of Congress, but any act or resolution may be passed over his veto by a two-thirds vote in each house. The heads of the various executive departments constitute collectively the cabinet, or body of official advisers of the president. The members of the cabinet are now 9 in number: secretary of state, secretary of the treasury, secretary of war, secretary of the navy, attorney-general, postmaster-general, secretary of the interior, secretary of agriculture, and secretary of commerce and labor.

The lowest federal courts are the district courts, a state comprising one or more districts. Next in order come the circuit courts. There are 9 circuits. In each circuit there is also a circuit court of appeals, in which appeals are heard from the district and circuit courts. At the head of the judicial department is the supreme court, consisting of a chief justice and 8 associate justices. There is also a federal court of claims. Federal judges hold office for life.

The regular mode of amendment of the constitution is through the votes of the two houses of Congress, a two-thirds vote of each house being requisite. When an amendment has thus been adopted by Congress, it is submitted to the individual states and, if accepted by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, it becomes part of the constitution. Another mode, by means of a constitutional convention, with ratifying conventions in the individual states, is provided for by the constitution.

By the constitution of the United States each state is guaranteed a republican form of government. In general, the government of the individual states is modelled upon the same principles as that of the United States. The state legislatures are bicameral, the upper house being styled the senate, and the lower house the house of representatives, the assembly, or the house of delegates. The system of electing the heads of the executive departments prevails, and, as a rule, judges are elected, their tenure, except in a very few of the states, being for a term of years and not for life.

There are large portions of the national domain not constituted as states. They comprise the organized territories, the unorganized territories, the District of Columbia, and the insular possessions recently acquired from Spain. The governors of the organized and unorganized territories, as well as the higher judicial officers, are appointed by the president for a term of 4 years. The organized territories are represented in the national legislature by a delegate in the house of representatives who, however, has no vote. They have legislatures elected by the people. The District of Columbia is governed by commissioners appointed by the president, and its citizens have no voice in the administration of their affairs.

Great diversity prevails among the states of the republic with regard to local government, manifested chiefly in the varying relative importance of the county and town (township). The town system is especially characteristic of the New England states, whose local affairs are largely conducted through the town meeting.

In 1901 the maximum number of enlisted men in the United States army was fixed at 100,000. The United States military and naval academies (at West Point and Annapolis) rank among the foremost institutions of their respective classes. Several of the states have institutions where military instruction is given by regular army officers detailed for that purpose.

Colleges and Universities.—Among the most noted or most largely attended universities and colleges for men or for men and women in the United States are the following: in the New England states, Harvard University (Cambridge, Mass.), Yale University (New Haven, Conn.), Wesleyan University (Middletown, Conn.), Brown University (Providence, R.I.), Williams College (Williamstown, Mass.), Dartmouth College (Hanover, N.H.), Bowdoin College (Brunswick, Me.), Amherst College (Amherst, Mass.), Boston University, Tufts College (Medford, Mass.), University of Vermont (Burlington), and Clark University (Worcester, Mass.); in the Middle Atlantic states, Columbia University (New York city), Princeton University (Princeton, N.J.), Cornell University (Ithaca, N.Y.), University of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia), New York University (New York city), Lafayette College (Easton, Pa.), Hamilton College (Clinton, N.Y.), Syracuse University, Rutgers College (New Brunswick, N.J.), Lehigh University (South Bethlehem, Pa.), Union College (Schenectady, N.Y.), the University of Rochester, Colgate University (Hamilton, N.Y.), and Hobart College (Geneva, N.Y.); in the District of Columbia, George Washington (formerly Columbian) University; in the Southern states, Johns Hopkins University (Baltimore, Md.), University of Virginia (Charlottesville), Washington and Lee University (Lexington, Va.), William and Mary College (Williamsburg, Va.), West Virginia University (Morgantown), South Carolina College (Columbia), University of Georgia (Athens), University of Alabama (Tuscaloosa), Vanderbilt University (Nashville, Tenn.), University of Tennessee (Knoxville), Tulane University (New Orleans, La.), and University of Texas (Austin and Galveston); in the North-Central states, University of Michigan (Ann Arbor), Chicago University, University of Wisconsin (Madison), University of Minnesota (Minneapolis), University of Nebraska (Lincoln), University of Illinois (Urbana), University of Iowa (Iowa City), University of Kansas (Lawrence), Indiana University (Bloomington), Northwestern University (Chicago and Evanston, Ill.), Western Reserve University (Cleveland, Ohio), University of Missouri (Columbia and Rolla), Washington University (St. Louis, Mo.), Ohio State University (Columbus), University of Cincinnati, and Oberlin College (Oberlin, Ohio); in the Western Division, Leland Stanford, Jr., University (Palo Alto, Cal.), University of California (Berkeley and San Francisco), and University of Colorado (Boulder). Among the most prominent colleges for women are Bryn Mawr College (Bryn Mawr, Pa.), Radcliffe College, affiliated with Harvard University (Cambridge, Mass.), Vassar College (Poughkeepsie, N.Y.), Smith College (Northampton, Mass.), Wellesley College (Wellesley, Mass.), Barnard College, connected with Columbia University (New York city), Mount Holyoke College (South Hadley, Mass.), and the Woman's College of Baltimore. Among the leading independent technological institutes are the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (Boston), Worcester Polytechnic Institute (Worcester, Mass.), Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute (Troy, N.Y.), Stevens Institute of Technology (Hoboken, N.J.), Case School of Applied Science (Cleveland, Ohio), Purdue University (Lafayette, Ind.), Rose Polytechnic Institute (Terre Haute, Ind.), Armour Institute of Technology (Chicago), Iowa State College of Agriculture and the Mechanic Arts (Ames), Michigan College of Mines (Houghton), and Colorado College of Mines (Golden). Tuskegee (Ala.) is the seat of the Tuskegee Institute, for colored people; Nashville, of the Fisk University, for the training of colored teachers; Hampton (Va.), of the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute, for colored people and Indians; and Carlisle (Pa)., of the United States Indian Industrial Training School.

Upsala, ŏŏp-sä'lä (often called Upsal by English writers), a län or province of Sweden, extending from the Gulf of Bothnia on the N. to Lake Mälar on the S. Area, 2051 sq. m. Half of the surface is covered with forest. The soil yields good crops of grain. The province contains the iron-mines of Dannemora. Capital, Upsala. Pop. in 1900, 123,863.

Upsala, a city of Sweden, capital of the län or province of Upsala, 45 miles NW. of Stockholm. Lat. of observatory, 59° 51′ 29″ N.; lon. 17° 37′ 34″ E. It is situated in a fertile plain on the river Tyris, which is spanned by five bridges. The old town lies on the slope of the W. bank, while the modern quarters rise on the flat E. bank. Upsala was in ancient times the commercial metropolis of Sweden and is historically the most interesting town of the kingdom. The university of Upsala, with which the labors of Linnæus are inseparably associated, was founded in 1477. Its oldest building, the Gustavianum, dates from the time of Gustavus Adolphus; the new university building was erected in 1877–86. The number of students in 1904 was 1451. The university institutions comprise a library (315,000 volumes), containing the famous Codex Argenteus, a manuscript of the translation of the Gospels by Ulfilas, dating from the fourth century; a zoological institute, observatory, mineralogical collections, chemical and physical laboratories, etc. The cathedral, in the French-Gothic style, was begun in 1230 and finished in 1435, with the exception of the towers, which are modern. The Trefaldighets-Kyrka (Church of the Trinity) is even more ancient than the cathedral, but architectually far less interesting. On an eminence S. of the town, commanding a fine view, is the Slott, a castle founded by Gustavus Vasa in 1548, but left unfinished. Upsala is the seat of an archbishop, who is primate of Sweden. The industries of the town are unimportant. Pop. in 1900, 22,855. About 3 miles to the N. of Upsala is the village of Gamla-Upsala ("Old Upsala") on the site of a place which was a religious and political centre in heathen times.

Ural (Russ. pron. oo-rȧl'), a river of Russia, rises on the eastern slope of the Ural Mountains, in the government of Orenburg, NE. of Iremel Mountain, and flows S. to Orsk, where, through a break in the Ural chain, its course is directed westward to Orenburg and Uralsk. From Uralsk the course is almost due S. to the Caspian Sea, which it enters by several delta-arms, the main arm being a short distance below Guriev. The total length is estimated at about 1400 miles. Its principal affluents are, on the right, the Kizil and Sak-mara and, on the left, the Sunduk, Or, and Ilek. The river is but little serviceable for navigation, except at high water, when craft of considerable size reach Orenburg. For some distance E. of Orenburg the Ural forms the boundary between Europe and Asia (the government of Orenburg and the territory of Turgai). The river abounds in fish, particularly towards its mouth, where the Ural Cossacks have extensive fisheries.

Ural Mountains, a mountain-system of the Russian Empire, forming for the greater part of its extent the physiographic boundary between Europe and Asia. It is almost the only extensive mountain-chain of the globe whose direction is transverse to the continental trend, and which, without co-ordinated parallel lines of other mountains, occupies a subcentral position in a continent. It extends from the borders of the Arctic Ocean, in about lat. 68° 30′ N., in a meridional direction to the Ural River, ESE. of Orenburg, whence it is continued by the so-called Mogodshar Mountains to the highland of the Aral Sea or to about lat. 45° 30′ N. The mountains thus extend through 23 degrees of latitude (1600 miles). With the islands of Nova Zembla as a direct orographic continuation (effected by the Pakhoi offshoot), the chain traverses nearly 32 degrees of latitude, or approximately the same distance that marks the extension of the true Rocky Mountains in the North American continent. The Ural Mountains, especially on their western side, consist of a large number of undulating rolls and eminences, hardly presenting the aspect of true mountains, but on the eastern side, directed to the Siberian plain, the mountain characteristics are much more sharply defined and the descent to the lowland ordinarily much more abrupt. A dominating crest-line is most marked in the northern and southern sections of the chain, where several summits attain elevations exceeding 5000 feet. In the central section, as in the crossing between Perm and Yekaterinburg, or in the passage of the Transsiberian railway to Tchelyabinsk, the summits have died down so low that mountains as such are barely determinable, recalling the closely parallel feature of the Rocky Mountains of the United States immediately S. of the Laramie Hills. The N. and S. trend of the Ural Mountains is mainly along or close to the 60th meridian of E. longitude, where may be said to be the water-parting between the basins of the Volga and Petchora on one side and the Ob-Irtish on the other. The Ural River finds a passage through the system in its southern section, where a subsidence area marks a separation from the Mogodshar range.

The northern Urals, which may be said to lie between the Arctic waters and the head-streams of the Petchora, are of a barren and forbidding aspect, bare on the loftier summits and covered in part with steppe-grass, mosses, and lichens on the lower slopes. The forest growth of conifers, birch, beech, etc., which so largely appears on the more southerly sections, is almost entirely wanting. In this section of the chain, in about lat. 64° N., is the culminating point of the system, the Telpös-is, 5526 (5435) feet. Despite their far northerly extension, no part of the Ural Mountains carries glaciers, a condition that is attributable to the lack of sufficient precipitation to form glaciers. Only in a few particularly sheltered spots is snow to be seen throughout the summer months. The Ural Mountains, while to some extent a faunal barrier, are in themselves hardly sufficient to differentiate Asiatic and European zoological regions, and the animals by which they are inhabited are on both sides normally those that belong to both the Russian and Siberian regions. Among the more common types are the lynx, wolf, bear, glutton, fox and other fur-bearing quadrupeds, elk, reindeer, numerous rodents, etc., and among birds a large number of the grouse and partridge types. The Ural Mountain region has long been famous for its mineral wealth, which includes among metals gold (both in reefs and placers), silver, copper, iron, lead, and platinum. The yield of the last-named was at one time very large and important, but latterly its production has been very materially reduced. Coal is extensively mined; likewise rock-salt. Much the greater part of the raw iron-ore of Russia is furnished by the Ural region, and particularly by the governments of Perm, Orenburg, Vyatka, and Vologda. Most of the mining is carried on in the region included between lat. 54° and 60° N. Of the precious or highly-prized minerals and rocks, for which the region is hardly less famous than for its metals, are the emerald and topaz (from the mines of Murzinsk), the diamond, malachite, azurite, and jasper. Among the loftiest summits, in addition to the Telpös-is, are Konshakovski (or Konyakovski), lat. 60° N., for a long time thought to be the culminating point of the chain, 5230 ft.; Yaman-tau, 5397 ft.; Iremel, lat. 54° 30′ N., 5230 ft.; and Deneshkin, 5015 ft.

Uralsk, oo-rȧlsk', a territory of Asiatic Russia, bounded SW. by the Caspian Sea and traversed by the river Ural. Area of the land-surface, about 125,000 sq. m. Urbino, oor-bee'no (anc. Urbinum), a town of central Italy, in the Marches, capital of the province of Pesaro e Urbino, 20 miles SW. of Pesaro. Urbino is picturesquely situated on a hill. Its streets are narrow and crooked. The ducal palace, erected in 1467–82, is the most imposing edifice. The most interesting ecclesiastical structures are the church of Santo Spirito, with some good paintings; San Domenico, with a fine portal, dating from 1449; San Francesco, erected in the fourteenth century, with a handsome campanile; and the Oratorio della Confraternità di San Giovanni Battista, whose walls are covered with paintings by the brothers Severino. The new cathedral, dating from 1801, also contains valuable pictures. Urbino is the birthplace of Raphael, to whom a fine monument was erected in 1897. The house in which he was born is now the property of the Reale Accademia Raffaello. Urbino has an unimportant university, founded in 1671, which is little more than a law-school, and an academy of fine arts. The town manufactures silk and cheese. Its majolica-ware formerly enjoyed great repute. The town is the seat of an archbishop. At the close of the Middle Ages Urbino was the splendid capital of a duchy, ruled by the house of Montefeltro. This dynasty was succeeded by the house of Rovere, to which Pope Julius II. belonged. In 1626 Urbino was annexed to the papal possessions, of which it formed part until 1860. Pop. Urfa, Urfah, oor'fä, or Orfa, a town of Asiatic Turkey, vilayet of Aleppo, in the NW. part of Mesopotamia, 78 miles SW. of Diarbekr. It is on the site of the ancient Edessa, a great city in the time of the successors of Alexander and in the period of the Roman Empire, capital of the realm of Osrhoëne, a famous seat of early Christianity, and a centre of Syrian learning. Edessa was the capital of a Christian principality, founded by the Crusaders at the close of the eleventh century and destroyed by the Mussulmans in 1144. There are remains of the old castle and walls. Among the many mosques is one sacred to Abraham, with whose story Urfa is connected in Mohammedan legend. The town is a busy seat of the cotton-industry and has a large trade in grain, of which the district yields bountiful crops. There are many Mohammedan and Christian schools. About one-fourth of the inhabitants are Christians, largely Armenians and Jacobites. Pop. about 55,000.

Urlton, a post-village of Greene co., N.Y. The banking point is Coxsackie. Pop. 150.

Urmiah, a lake and town of Persia. See URUMIAH.

Urmston, a town of Lancashire, England, 4 miles from Manchester. Pop. in 1901, 6594.

Urnäsch, oor'nĕsh, a village of Switzerland, 6 miles WSW. of Appenzell.

Urne, a post-hamlet of Buffalo co., Wis.

Urnen (oor'nĕn), Ober, and Nieder (nee'dĕr), two villages of Switzerland, canton and 6 miles NNW. of Glarus.

Urness, a post-township of Douglas co., Minn. Pop. in 1900, 616.

Urr Water, a small river of Scotland, which enters Solway Firth 10 miles E. of Kirkcudbright.

Ursa, a post-village of Adams co., Ill., on the Burlington Route, 10 miles N. of Quincy. Pop. 125.

Urseren- (or Ursern-) Thal, oor'zĕ-rĕn (oor'zĕrn) tāl, a valley of Switzerland, comprising the S. part of the canton of Uri. It is watered by the Reuss and is about 8 miles long.

Ursina, ŭr-si'nä, a post-borough of Somerset co., Pa., on the Baltimore and Ohio and the Ursina and North Fork Rs., 86 miles SSE. of Pittsburg. It has coaling-industries. Pop. in 1900, 423.

Urua, oo-ro'ä, a native state or kingdom of central Africa, within the territory of the Congo Free State, and between the Lomami River on the W. and Lake Tanganyika on the E. The chief settlement is Kilemba, in about lat. 7° 40′ S.

Uruapan, oo-roo-ä'pän, a town of Mexico, state of Michoacán, 55 miles SW. of Morelia. Pop. in 1900, 9808.

Urubamba, a river of Peru, which (under several names, Quilabamba, Vilcabamba, etc.) traverses the greater part of the department of Cuzco, and falls into the Ucayali in about lat. 10° 40′ S.

Urubamba, oo-roo-bäm'bä, a town of Peru, department and 28 miles NW. of Cuzco, on the river Urubamba. Altitude, about 9600 feet.

Urubú, a river of Brazil, state of Pará, joins the Amazon nearly opposite the junction of the Madeira.

Urubú, oo-roo-boo′, or Urubú de Cima, oo-roo-boo dā see′mā, a town of Brazil, in Bahia, on the right bank of the São Francisco, 320 miles W. by S. of the city of Bahia.

Urubucuara, or Urubuquara, oo-roo-boo-kwā′rā, a river of Brazil, state of Pará, rises in the Serra Velha, flows S., expands into a lake of its own name, and 20 miles below joins the Amazon about 120 miles NE. of Santarem.

Urubú de Baixa, Brazil. See PROPIHA.

Urucahi, óo-roo-kā-ee′, a river of Brazil, state of Piauhy, rises in the Serra Gurgueia, flows N., and joins the Paranahyba nearly opposite the junction of the Balças.

Uruguay (Sp. pron. oo-roo-gwī′), a river of South America, rises in Brazil, on the W. slope of the cordillera of Santa Catharina and Rio Grande do Sul. It flows NW. for about 100 miles, entering the plains of Vicaria, where it is joined on the right by the Pelotas, which name it also bears in this part of its course. After receiving the Uruguay-Pita on the left, it proceeds W., and then turns SW., being augmented by numerous streams, particularly by the Ibicuy and the Cuareim, the latter separating Brazil from Uruguay. In its remaining course, almost due S. for about 400 miles, it forms the boundary between Uruguay and the Argentine Republic, receiving on the right the Mirinai and Gualeguaichú and on the left the Arapey, Daimán, Queguay, and the most important of its tributaries, the Rio Negro. About 50 miles below the influx of the Rio Negro, in lat. 34° S. and lon. 58° 20′ W., it unites with the Paraná to form the Rio de la Plata. The whole course of the Uruguay is about 950 miles. From its mouth to Fray Bentos it is about 6–9 miles wide; at the Brazilian frontier its width is 1500 yards. The river is navigable for large vessels to Paysandú, and for those of lighter draught to Salto, where occurs the cataract of Salto Chico. Beyond the cataract there are again long stretches of open navigation. The banks of the Uruguay are fertile.

Uruguay, or República Oriental del Uruguay, (o-re-ĕn-tāl′ dĕl oo-roo-gwī′), a republic of South America, bounded N. and NE. by Brazil, E. by the Atlantic Ocean, S. by the Rio de la Plata, and W. by the Argentine Republic, from which it is separated by the Uruguay River. Lat. 30° to 35° S.; lon. 53° to 58° 20′ W. Area, 71,750 sq. m. Uruguay is as a whole a vast plain, generally flat towards the Uruguay, the Rio de la Plata, and the sea-coast, but broken in the interior by several ridges of moderate elevation (the Cuchilla Grande and the Cuchilla de Haedo), which are composed for the most part of clay-slate, gneiss, and granite and which form the water-sheds of the more important rivers. These are the Rio Negro, by far the largest, which, rising beyond the Cuchilla de Santa Anna range in Brazil, flows SW. to its junction with the Uruguay, and divides the state into two nearly equal portions; the Yaguari, in the N.; the Arapey, Daimán, and Queguay, also tributaries of the Uruguay; the Santa Lucía and San José, which unite and fall into the Rio de la Plata; and the Sebollati (or Cebollati) and Yaguarón (Jaguarão), the two most important feeders of the large Lake Mirim, which is situated in the NE., partly in Brazil, and forms an important hydrographical feature of the country. The climate is generally humid, but temperate and healthy; in the winter heavy rains and cold winds are prevalent, but frosts are unknown. The natural pastures are very extensive and luxuriant. The broad plains, covered with rich turf, and almost destitute of trees, seem admirably adapted to agriculture, but remain for the most part in a state of nature, and are roamed over by immense herds of horses and cattle. These, together with sheep, form the chief source of wealth to the inhabitants, supplying large exports of hides, skins, hair, horns, jerked beef, and tallow. The census of animals showed in 1901, 6,326,601 head of cattle, 575,361 horses, 17,624,548 sheep, and 22,184 mules. The chief sheep-breeding departments are Durazno and Soriano. The wool-clip in 1900 amounted to 32,750 metric tons. Wheat, maize, barley, millet, oats, rye, and flaxseed constitute the chief agricultural crops. The production of wheat in 1900 amounted to 6,891,397 bushels, and of maize to nearly 8,000,000 bushels. The country is adapted to the culture of most of the fruits of temperate climates. The mineral wealth of Uruguay is still largely undeveloped, but gold, silver, copper, and lead are known to exist. Gold is mined in the department of Rivera, the product in 1901 having amounted to about 2300 ounces. Montevideo, on the Rio de la Plata, is the centre of the foreign trade. There were in 1899 997 miles of railroad in operation. The chief towns are Montevideo, the capital, San José, Colonia, Paysandú, Salto, Fray Bentos, and Santa Rosa.

The population of Uruguay at the close of 1902 was estimated at 978,000, of which number about one-fourth resided in Montevideo. There is a great admixture of the blood of the Indians in that of the natives, descendants of Spaniards and to some extent of Portuguese. The language is Spanish and the religion Roman Catholic. The republic is divided into 19 departments: Artigas, Canelones, Cerro Largo, Durazno, Flores, Florida, La Colonia, Maldonado, Minas, Montevideo, Paysandú, Rio Negro, Rivera, Rocha, Salto, San José, Soriano, Tacuarembó, and Treinta y Tres. The chief institution of learning is the university of Montevideo. There are many periodicals published in the state. Uruguay is governed by a president elected for a term of 4 years. The legislative power is vested in a senate, whose members (19 in number, 1 for each department) are elected by indirect election for a term of 6 years, and a house of representatives, elected for a term of 3 years.

The possession of the region N. of the Rio de la Plata (the Banda Oriental, or "Eastern Strip," as the Spaniards called it) was long disputed by Spain and Portugal, the authority of the former being finally established. The territory formed part of the viceroyalty of Buenos Aires. While Buenos Aires was struggling for independence from the mother country, Brazil reasserted the Portuguese claim and for a short time occupied the region, but in 1828 she was compelled to recognize the independence of Uruguay. In 1830 the República Oriental del Uruguay was organized.

Uruguayana, a town and railway station of Brazil, near the western extremity of the state of Rio Grande do Sul, on the Uruguay River. Pop. about 4000.

Urumiah, oo-roo-mee′yā, written also Urmiah (Pers. Urmi, oor-mee′), a town of Persian Armenia, in Azerbaijan, 12 miles W. of Lake Urumiah and 64 miles SW. of Tabriz. Elevation, 4400 feet. The town, not prepossessing in its architecture, lies in the midst of gardens and orchards. It is noted as a centre of missionary activity and is the seat of Fiske Seminary (for girls) and of Urmiah College. It is the reputed birthplace of Zoroaster. Pop. estimated at between 30,000 and 50,000, including many Christians.

Urumiah, Lake of, a large body of water in the NW. corner of Persia, province of Azerbaijan, about 170 miles W. of the Caspian Sea and about 120 miles SE. of Lake Van. It is about 80 miles long and its breadth varies from 15 to 35 miles. Area, 1795 sq. m. It is situated at an elevation of about 4100 feet. There are several islands and many islets in it. The lake is extremely shallow. It receives numerous streams but has no outlet, so that its waters are very saline, fish being unable to live in it. The surrounding country is famed for its fertility.

Urumptsi, oo-roomt′see‵, or Urumchi (Chinese, Tihoa, te-ho′ā), a town of the Chinese Empire, in Dzungaria, N. of the Tian-Shan Mountains, in about lat 43° 45′ N., lon. 87° 50′ E. It is on the caravan route connecting Peking (via Turfan) and Kulja, and has an extensive trade. Pop. estimated at 30,000.

Urundi, a region in German East Africa, adjacent to Lake Tanganyika on the NE.

Urup, oo-roop′, one of the Kuril Islands, immediately N. of Iturup. Lat. 45° 39′ N. Length, about 50 miles.

Usagara, a mountainous region in the E. part of German East Africa, between about lat. 6° 30′ and 7° 30′ S., and N. of the Rufiji River.

Usagre, oo-sā′grā, a small town of Spain, in Estremadura, 50 miles SE. of Badajoz.

Usal, a post-village of Mendocino co., Cal. The banking point is Fort Bragg. Pop. 200.

Usambara, a mountainous and largely forested region of German East Africa, bordering on the Indian Ocean, and included between the Pangani River and British East Africa.

Usbeks. See UZBEKS.

Usedom, oo′zĕh-dom‵, an island of the Baltic Sea, belonging to the Prussian province of Pomerania, between the Swine and Peene outlets of the Stettiner Haff (through which the river Oder discharges), 7 miles SE. of the island of Rügen and separated by the Swine from the island of Wollin. Its shape is very irregular, the NW. part forming a peninsula. Length, 36 miles. Area, 158 sq. m. The inhabitants are engaged in agriculture, cattle-rearing, fishing, and navigation. The island contains frequented seabathing resorts. The chief towns are Swinemünde and Usedom. Pop. about 35,000.

Usedom, a town of Prussia, in Pomerania, on the SW. shore of the island of Usedom. Pop. about 1750.

Ushak, oo-shăk′, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in the vilayet of Khodavendikyar (Brusa), 130 miles E. by N. of Smyrna. It is famous for its carpets, the manufacture of which is said to employ about 2000 looms. Pop. about 13,000 (?).

Ushant. See OUESSANT.

Ushaw, the seat of St. Cuthbert's Roman Catholic College, 4 miles from Durham, England.

Ushitza, a town of Servia. See UZHITZA.

Üshküp, a town of Turkey. See ÜSKÜP.

Ushuaia, a village of Patagonia, chief settlement of the Argentine portion of Tierra del Fuego, on the N. side of Beagle Channel, in about lat. 54° 52′ S.

Ushugat Island, Alaska. See BARREN ISLANDS.

Usingen, oo'zing-ẹn, a town of Prussia, in the province of Hesse-Nassau, district of Wiesbaden, on the Usbach, 17 miles NNW. of Frankfort. Pop. about 2000.

Usk, a river of Wales and England, enters the estuary of the Severn 3½ miles S. of Newport. Length, about 60 miles.

Usk, a town of England, co. of Monmouth, on the Usk, 11 miles SW. of Monmouth. Pop. in 1901, 1476.

Üsküp', Üshküp, or Üshküb, also called Skopia (Slavic, Skoplye; anc. Scupi), a town of European Turkey, in the vilayet of Kossovo, on the river Vardar, 100 miles NW. of Saloniki, with which it is connected by rail. It is an important trade-centre and a busy industrial town, the leather-, dyeing- and weaving-industries and the manufacture of metallic articles being represented. A fine industrial school has recently been opened here. The population consists of Turks, Albanians (mostly Mohammedans), Serbs, Bulgarians, and Greeks. The town is the seat of a Bulgarian bishop and of a Roman Catholic Albanian archbishop. Pop. estimated at 20,000.

Uslar, ŏŏs'lạr, a town of Prussia, in Hanover, 16 miles NW. of Göttingen, on the Aale. Pop. about 2300.

Usman, oos-mȧn', a town of Russia, 85 miles SW. of Tambov. Pop. in 1897, 9843.

Uspallata Pass, Andes. See CUMBRE, LA.

Uspanapán, oos-pȧ-nȧ-pȧn', a river of Mexico, state of Vera Cruz, a tributary to the Coatzacoalcos.

Usquepaug, ŭs'kwe-pawg, or Usquebaugh, a post-village of Washington co., R.I., 17 miles W. of Newport. Pop. 150.

Ussa, ŏŏs'sȧ, a river of Russia, rises in the Ural Mountains, flows SW., and joins the Petchora after a course of over 400 miles.

Ussat-les-Bains, üs'sȧ' lȧ bȧⁿ, a village and watering-place of France, department of Ariège, arrondissement of Foix. It has hot mineral springs.

Ussel, üs'sȅl', a town of France, capital of an arrondissement in the department of Corrèze, 32 miles NE. of Tulle. Pop. in 1901, 3356 (commune, 4693).

Ussery, a post-village of Garland co., Ark. The banking point is Hot Springs.

Usson, üs'sôⁿ', a village of France, in Puy-de-Dôme, 5 miles W. of Issoire. Here are ruins of a castle, long the residence of Margaret, the first queen of Henry IV. of France.

Ussuri, oo-soo'ree, a river of eastern Asia, rises in the SE. part of Primorskaya, flows N., forming much of the boundary between Primorskaya and Manchuria, and joins the Amur a short distance above Khabarovsk. It is about 450 miles in length and is navigated by steamboats.

Ustarits, üs'tȧ'reets', a small town of France, in Basses-Pyrénées, 7 miles S. of Bayonne.

Ust-Bielokalitvensk'aya, a settlement in the territory of the Don Cossacks, Russia, on the Donets, 93 miles NE. of Rostov. Pop. in 1897, 18,039.

Uster, oos'tẹr, a commune and manufacturing village of Switzerland, canton and 9 miles SE. of Zürich. Pop. (commune) in 1900, 7801.

Ustica, oos'te-kȧ, an island in the Mediterranean Sea, belonging to Italy, off the N. coast of Sicily, 38 miles NNW. of Palermo. The soil is volcanic and highly fertile. Pop. in 1901, 1992.

Ustiug Veliki, oos-te-oog' vȧ-lee'kee ("Great Ustiug"), a town of Russia, government of Vologda, on the river Sukhona, near its confluence with the Yug, 580 miles ENE. of St. Petersburg. It has a great number of churches. Pop. in 1897, 11,309.

Ust-Kam'enogorsk', a town of Asiatic Russia, on the Irtish, government and 115 miles ESE. of the town of Semipalatinsk.

Ust-Medvieditsa, oost med-ve-ȧ'dit-sȧ, a town of Russia, in the N. part of the territory of the Don Cossacks, on the river Don, at the influx of the Medvieditsa. Pop. about 15,000.

Ustron, a town and watering-place of Austria-Hungary, in Silesia, district of Bielitz, on the river Vistula. It has large iron-works. Pop. in 1900, 4673.

Ust-Sysolsk, oost se-solsk', a town of Russia, government and 420 miles NE. of Vologda, at the junction of the Sysola and Vytchegda. Pop. about 4500.

Ust-Urt, a name given to a steppe and desert region of Asiatic Russia, almost wholly in the Transcaspian Territory, extending between the Caspian Sea on the W. and the Aral Sea on the E. It is a plateau of moderate elevation (about 650–800 feet), contains a number of lakes and salines, and is but sparsely inhabited.

Ustyuzh'na, a town of Russia, government and 200 miles NE. of Novgorod, on the Mologa. Pop. about 5000.

Usulután, oo-soo-loo-tȧn', a southern department of Salvador, bounded on the S. by the Pacific Ocean and on the W. by the Lempa River. Area, 1290 sq. m. It is mountainous in the N. and low towards the coast. The products are coffee, rice, tobacco, indigo, timber, fruits, and salt. Capital, Usulután. Pop. in 1902, 80,400.

Usulután, a city of Salvador, capital of Usulután department, on the Juano River, 60 miles (direct) ESE. of San Salvador. Pop. in 1902, 11,856.

Usumacinta, oo-soo-mȧ-sin'tȧ, a river of Mexico and Central America, rises as the Chixoy (Chixoy de las Salinas) in the W. part of Guatemala, forms part of the boundary between that republic and the state of Chiapas, Mexico, traverses the state of Tabasco, and, after a course of several hundred miles, joins the Tabasco near its mouth. It is also connected by a navigable channel with the Laguna de Términos. It is navigable for a short distance.

Usumbura, a station in German East Africa, in Urundi, and at the N. extremity of Lake Tanganyika. Lat. 3° 24′ S.; lon. 29° 22′ 30″ E.

Usun-ada, a bay in the SE. shore of the Caspian Sea, opening in lat. 40° N.

Usuri, a river of Asia. See USSURI.

Usutu, oo-soo'too, a river of Swaziland, southern Africa, joins the Pongola to form the Maputa.

Utah, yoo'taw or yoo'tȧ, a western state of the United States, bounded N. by Idaho, NE. by Wyoming, E. by Colorado, S. by Arizona, and W. by Nevada. The northern line follows the parallels of 41° and 42° N. lat., the eastern the meridians of 111° and 109° 4′ W. lon., the southern the parallel of 37° N. lat., and the western the meridian of 114° 4′ W. lon. Area of the land-surface, 82,190 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 2780 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—The great Wasatch range of mountains divides Utah into two somewhat unequal parts, the western (which belongs to the Great Basin) being the smaller but more important division. These mountains are exceedingly wild and picturesque, pierced by many cañons, and sending up many peaks which during most of the year are covered with snow (Provo Peak, 11,000 feet; South Tent, 11,240 ft.). W. of the Wasatch Mountains the country, whose floor-level is maintained at a general elevation of 4200–5000 ft., is traversed by many N. and S. ranges of broken mountains, interspersed with arid plains, valleys, and basins (occasionally lake-bearing), generally having a dreary desert aspect and a somewhat scanty vegetation. Among these mountains are the Oquirrh, Beaver, Parowan, Pah Vant, Tushar (Tushar Mountain, 12,146 ft.), Sevier, Iron, Lake, Onaqui, Stansbury, Thomas, House, Pahoton or Cedar, Goshoot, etc. This great region, barring the extreme NW., where there are a few minor streams, tributary to the Snake River, has no streams whose waters flow to the ocean, but E. of the Wasatch the country has a different character. Here the principal mountains (Uinta, Roan, Pah-Utah, etc.) break up into a region of plateaus, bordered by steep escarpments (Book Cliffs, Tavaputs, etc.), rather than of ridges, the rivers flowing very generally in deep cañons. Most of this region, which lies wholly in the basin of the Colorado River, is utterly sterile; but along the principal streams (Uinta, Green, Grand, San Juan, and Colorado) there are some meadow-lands, and where irrigation can be effected there is no difficulty in raising good crops. The singularly domed (laccolitic) Henry Mountains (about 11,000 ft.) are in the SE. and the volcanic La Sal (with Mount Peale, 13,089 ft.) in the E. Wilson Peak, in the Uinta Range, rises to 13,300 ft., Emmons Peak to 13,624 ft., and Gilbert Peak to 13,687 ft.

Lakes and Rivers.—The principal rivers E. of the Wasatch Mountains have been already named. In the Great Basin we find the Great Salt Lake (which see), a shallow expanse of strong brine, covering 2000 sq. m. and receiving the waters of the Bear, Weber, and Jordan rivers, with some smaller streams. It is now merely the remnant of a former (Quaternary), much more extensive lake-basin, whose ancient beach-lines are clearly incised as terraces upon the encircling mountains, 900–1000 feet above the present water-level. To this former body of water, which drained NW. into the Pacific, geologists have given the name of Lake Bonneville. The Jordan discharges the waters of Utah Lake, which contains fresh water, abounding in trout. The Sevier River flows into Sevier Lake. Bear Lake is on the border of Idaho. None of the streams of the Great Basin are large, and many of them sink into the earth or are dissipated in vapor before they reach any actual lake-basin. There are in Utah no navigable streams, but a few adventurous explorers have descended the Colorado and its main tributaries in boats, encountering great perils, and finding their chief reward in the contemplation of some of the grandest and most unique scenery in the world.

Geology and Mineral Wealth.—Archæan and metamorphic rocks form the cores of many of the mountain-ranges, whose periods of elevation were continued into Tertiary times. The Palæozoic series, Jura-Trias, and Cretaceous are all well represented, the last covering immense areas, particularly in the eastern or plateau region, and at several points affording beds of coal of economic value. There are also extensive Tertiary regions, which are in some cases not clearly distinguishable from the Cretaceous, and these are also coal-bearing. The plains and valleys of the Great Basin are largely floored with a deep Quaternary detritus, deposited in part under ancient lacustrine waters. There are many lava-beds (some old and others comparatively recent), and there are numerous thermal springs. The great river-cañons of the plateau-region cut through and expose every one of the geological strata above named. The principal wealth of Utah must ever consist in her ores of the precious and other metals, gold, silver, lead, copper, iron, etc. The output of the principal metals in 1903 was: gold, 210,162 fine ounces, valued at $4,344,069; silver, 12,204,011 fine ounces, valued at $6,518,151; and copper, 38,302,602 pounds. The product of lead is very large. The quantity of coal mined in 1899 was 786,049 short tons, and of the asphaltic mineral gilsonite, 2500 tons; the coal product in 1903 was 1,681,409 short tons. Beds of kaolin, rock-salt, sulphur, gypsum, etc., are also found. Great Salt Lake affords much nearly pure salt, the quantity obtained from this source in 1900 having been valued at $139,488. The output of salt from the state in 1903 was 212,955 barrels. Excellent building-granite is very abundant.

Climate.—A marked character of the climate throughout the state is the scanty rainfall. The mountain-ranges receive much snow in winter, and destructive avalanches sometimes occur in the mining cañons; but these mountain-snows, which last far into the summer and in some places are perpetual, alone render agriculture possible, by supplying water in the rills and gulches. For the most part the climate is very healthful, agreeably warm in summer and not severe in winter, although extremes of temperature have been noted of —30° and 110°. The mean July temperature at Salt Lake City is about 70°; the mean of January, 28°. The annual rainfall ranges from 5 to 16 inches.

Agriculture.—Probably full nine-tenths of the state is naturally sterile; but a large population in the region of the Great Salt Lake has for a long term of years supported itself mainly by agriculture, rendered practicable by irrigation processes. Wherever irrigation can be applied, the soils (almost everywhere rich in all the elements of fertility) amply repay the expense. At present, wheat, oats, barley, Indian corn, hay, potatoes, dried and other fruit, and dairy products are leading staples. The production in 1900 was: wheat, 3,697,106 bushels; corn, 169,180 bushels; oats, 918,214 bushels; barley, 217,686 bushels; rye, 59,202 bushels; potatoes, 649,000 bushels; and hay, 509,855 tons. Cattle-raising is practicable on many of the plains where agriculture could not succeed, and it is very profitably carried on. The wool-industry is one of great importance. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 14,136,981 pounds.

Manufactures.—The Mormon population have long carried on some manufacturing for the supply of home wants, and as a rule only the more indispensable articles have been manufactured in quantity. Recently much capital has been invested in enterprises connected with the mining and reduction of ores, particularly of the ores of lead, the smelting and refining of which is the most important industry of the state. A new and profitable industry is the manufacture of beet-sugar, the product in 1900 having been valued at $1,037,355.

Education.—The leading educational institution is the University of Utah, located at Salt Lake City. The Salt Lake College and the Salt Lake Collegiate Institute are in the same city. Brigham Young College and the state agricultural college are at Logan. There are state normal schools at Salt Lake City and Cedar City, and there is a reformatory at Ogden.

Railroads.—The railroads in 1890 aggregated 1265 miles; in 1900, 1592 miles.

Counties, Cities, and Towns.—The counties in Utah number 27, as follows: Beaver, Boxelder, Cache, Carbon, Davis, Emery, Garfield, Grand, Iron, Juab, Kane, Millard, Morgan, Piute, Rich, Salt Lake, San Juan, Sanpete, Sevier, Summit, Tooele, Uinta, Utah, Wasatch, Washington, Wayne, and Weber. The principal cities and towns are Salt Lake City (the capital) and the head-quarters of the sect known as Mormons, or Latter-Day Saints (pop. in 1900, 53,531), Ogden, an important railroad centre (16,313), Provo City, a manufacturing place and the seat of the Utah Insane Asylum (6185), Logan (5451), Park City, Springville, and Spanish Fork.

Government.—The governor is elected for a term of 4 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of the former being elected for 4 years, and those of the latter for 2 years. Women enjoy the right of suffrage. The state sends 1 representative to the lower house of the national Congress.

Population.—The population in 1850 was 11,380; in 1860, 40,273; in 1870, 86,786, exclusive of the tribal Indians; in 1880, 143,963; in 1890, 207,905; and in 1900, 276,749 (inclusive of 2848 Indians settled on reservations). The dominant sect in the population of Utah is that of the Mormons. The characteristic feature of the Mormon community has been the practice of polygamy, now rapidly declining.

History.—Utah is a part of the territory acquired by the United States from Mexico in 1848. In the preceding year Brigham Young, the head of the Mormons, after their expulsion from Nauvoo, Ill., had come to this then almost utterly unknown region, which he afterwards named Deseret. The great body of his followers migrated to the region in 1848. Salt Lake City was founded, and a prosperous agricultural community sprang up, which increased rapidly through the vigorous Mormon propaganda carried on in the United States and Europe. In 1850 the territory of Utah was organized, Young being appointed governor. In 1857, Young having openly set at defiance the federal authority, President Buchanan sent troops to enforce obedience. In 1858 a compromise was effected; the authority, for practical purposes, remaining in the hands of Young and his followers. In 1882 Congress passed a stringent law against polygamy, and in 1890 the Morman church publicly decreed the discontinuance of the practice, which, however, still persists to some extent. In 1896 Utah was admitted as a state into the Union.

Utah, a county in the north-central part of Utah, has an area of 2123 sq. m. It is bounded on the E. by the Wasatch Range of mountains, and on the W. by the Oquirrh Mountains. Utrecht, yu′trĕkt (Dutch pron. ü′trĕkt; L. Trajectum ad Rhenum, Ultrajectum), a city of the Netherlands, capital of the province of Utrecht, 23 miles SE. of Amsterdam. Lat. of observatory, 52° 5′ 9″ N.; lon. 5° 7′ 55″ E. It is situated on the Old Rhine, where the Vecht branches off from it. The town is traversed by two canals, the Oude and Nieuwe Gracht, which are spanned by many bridges, and the streets present picturesque aspects. The Gothic cathedral, begun in 1254, long one of the finest churches in Holland, suffered severely in the hurricane of 1674, and the nave has never been rebuilt. The interior is embellished with interesting monuments. Among other ecclesiastical edifices are the late-Gothic church of St. Catharine, the Roman Catholic cathedral, which dates from 1524, and which was restored in 1880; St. Janskerk, the oldest church, begun in the eleventh century; and the modern St. Willibrodurskerk, with sumptuous interior decorations. The building of the university, founded in 1636, was recently enlarged by an addition in the Dutch-Renaissance style. An interesting secular structure is the Paushuizen (or "pope's house"), erected by the future pope Adrian VI. in 1517. It is now occupied by government offices. The old château of Oudaen, on the Oude Gracht, a Gothic building erected in the fourteenth century, has since 1759 been used as a home for the aged. On the site of the old ramparts have arisen pleasant promenades. E. of the town is the Maliebaan, a triple avenue of trees, which leads to the Hoogeland park. The university of Utrecht has more than 1000 students and a library of 250,000 volumes. The society of arts and sciences and the historical society occupy a high rank. The museum Kunstliefde contains paintings of early Utrecht masters; the archiepiscopal musuem exhibits specimens of Netherlandish sacred art; the royal mint contains Dutch coins, medals, etc. The city has a veterinary school, the only one in Holland. Utrecht is the seat of a Catholic archbishop and also of the archbishop of the Old Catholics (Jansenists). Pop. in 1899, 102,085, about one-third Catholics. Utrecht has saw-mills, machine-shops, breweries, and printing establishments, and manufactures of textiles, cigars, colors, chemicals, organs, etc. It is the seat of an active trade.

The bishopric of Utrecht was founded in Merovingian times at the close of the seventh century. The bishops acquired temporal sway over a considerable district, their principality being included in the Holy Roman (German) Empire. The city of Utrecht, after long conflicts, succeeded in emancipating itself from their rule. Early in the sixteenth century the see and the city became a possession of the Emperor Charles V. and were incorporated in the realm of the Netherlands. The Union of Utrecht, a compact between the seven Dutch provinces in revolt against Spain, concluded in 1579, established on a firm basis the foundations of the Dutch Republic. The treaty of Utrecht, concluded in 1713, terminated the War of the Spanish Succession; the Bourbon dynasty was seated on the throne of Spain, whose crown was shorn of the Netherlands, Lombardy, Naples, Sicily, and Sardinia.

Utrecht, a province of the Netherlands, bounded on the N. by the Zuider Zee. Area, 534 sq. m. The Lek (northern arm of the Rhine) forms its S. boundary; an arm of it, the Vecht, traverses the province. Capital, Utrecht. Pop. in 1899, 251,034.

Valencia, vȧ-lēn'she-ą (Sp. pron. vȧ-lēn'the-ȧ), a region and former kingdom of Spain, on the E. coast, now divided into the provinces of Valencia, Alicante, and Castellón de la Plana. It extends along the Mediterranean Sea between Catalonia on the N. and Murcia on the S. Area, 8830 sq. m. It is in the main a region of mountains of moderate elevation (the highest summit being about 6000 feet above the sea), between which are fertile and well-cultivated plains, whose productiveness depends largely upon artificial irrigation. The chief rivers are the Guadalaviar, Júcar, and Segura. The products include grain, wine, rice, sugar, and a variety of subtropical fruits. The inhabitants, an industrious people, have much Moorish blood in their veins. On the disruption of the caliphate of Cordova, early in the eleventh century, Valencia constituted for a time a Mohammedan kingdom. In the thirteenth century it was wrested from the Moors by Aragon. Pop. in 1900, 1,587,533.

Valencia, a province of Spain, bordering on the Mediterranean Sea. Area, 4150 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 806,556. Capital, Valencia.

Valencia (anc. Valentia), a maritime city of Spain, capital of the province of the same name, and residence of the capital-general of Valencia (the former kingdom of Valencia), situated in a fertile plain on the Guadalaviar, about 2 miles from the sea and 190 miles ESE. of Madrid. Valencia, with the tinted domes of its churches and the peculiar bustle of its dark and narrow streets, presents a semi-Oriental appearance. The mediæval walls were demolished in 1871, and on their site have arisen wide modern boulevards. The cathedral stands in the heart of the old town, where the three most ancient quarters meet. The church of San Martín, erected in the fifteenth century as a Gothic structure, has been thoroughly modernized, as has been San Andrés, originally a mosque, first restored in the thirteenth century. The latter contains fine pictures by Valencian painters. The splendid cathedral, on the supposed site of a temple of Diana, is said to date from 1262 and was finished in 1482. Its octagonal bell-tower and the graceful octagonal cimborium, with beautiful windows, are famous. The interior contains good paintings and interesting relics. The church of San Nicolás, originally a mosque, has valuable frescoes and fine stained-glass windows. The two Torres de Serranos, the old N. gate, flank a structure dating from the fourteenth century, the Gothic tracery of which is beautiful. The massive Torres de Cuarte, the W. gate, date from 1444. The old citadel, erected under Charles V., is now used as an arsenal and as the residence of the captain-general.

The largest square, the Plaza del Mercados, was the scene of mediæval tournaments. On it is the Lonja de la Seda (silk exchange), a fine Gothic structure, erected in the fifteenth century and recently restored. A part of the building serves now as a museum of antiquities. The Audiencia, formerly the meeting place of the deputies of the kingdom of Valencia, is a striking Renaissance building of the sixteenth century. Its interior is lavishly decorated. Among the many charming pleasure-grounds are the Glorieta, most attractively laid out early in the last century, on the site of the old glacis; the Alameda, the fashionable drive; and the botanical garden, the finest in Spain, rich in subtropical vegetation. The university of Valencia, founded in 1500, is one of the most famous institutions of learning in the kingdom. It has about 1700 students. The Museo Provincial de Pinturas contains more than 1500 paintings, mostly by Valencian masters.

The silk-industry of Valencia, formerly famous, has of late revived. Other manufactures include tobacco, glazed tiles (azulejos), fans, velvets, linen, and pottery. There are breweries. The city has a large trade, although it has of late lost some of its maritime importance. Its port is Villanueva del Grao, which is a seaside-resort. About 2800 vessels entered the harbor in 1901. Valencia is the seat of an archbishop. Pop. in 1900, 213,550.

On the site of the former fortifications, which were demolished in 1892, a fine park has been laid out. Most of the old streets are narrow and tortuous. St. Géry, a Gothic structure, dating in part from the thirteenth century, is the most ancient church. Notre Dame du Saint Cordon, a modern edifice in the style of the thirteenth century, is lavishly decorated. The town-hall, erected in the seventeenth century, is the most striking secular building. Valenciennes has a fine statue of Froissart, the famous chronicler, and another of the painter Antoine Watteau, whose birthplace it is. The museum of painting and sculpture is rich in works of the Flemish school; the museum of natural history contains a valuable mineralogical collection. Valenciennes has an arsenal, large barracks, and a military hospital. The famous Valenciennes lace was formerly made here. The industrial establishments comprise iron-works, sugar-refineries, textile-mills, chemical-works, etc. Pop. (commune) in 1901, 25,055.

Valetta, vå-lĕt'tå (Valletta), or La Valetta, a seaport, capital of the British island of Malta, on the NE. coast. Lat. 35° 53′ N.; lon. 14° 31′ E. It is picturesquely situated on a long neck of land, which, with the main-land on either side of it, forms two large and commodious harbors. Valetta is strongly fortified. The military works were mostly constructed by the Knights of Malta (Knights of St. John). The site of the city is uneven and in part so steep that many of the narrow streets are practically flights of stairs. The principal streets, however, are wide and well paved with lava. There are some handsome squares and the quays contain fine edifices. The principal structures are the palace of the grand masters of the Knights of Malta, now the governor's residence, and the cathedral, with tombs of the knights. The city has a university, an astronomical observatory, library, botanical garden, and a military hospital. It is the head-quarters of the British fleet in the Mediterranean. The place was named after the grand master Jean Parisot de la Valette, who successfully defended Malta against the Turks in 1565. Pop. in 1900, 61,268.

The Plaza Mayor, the principal square, contains arcades with shops. Near it is the cathedral, a late-Renaissance structure begun in 1585, which contains some good paintings and a famous monstrance. The most interesting edifice in Valladolid is the church of Santa Maria la Antigua, said to have been founded about 1088, with a lofty Romanesque tower. The Colegio de Santa Cruz, built in the fifteenth century, contains a museum, with excellent sculptures in wood and some fine paintings, among them three by Rubens. Near by is the house where Columbus died. The Colegio de San Gregorio, dating from 1488, serves now for municipal offices. It has a splendid late-Gothic façade, two handsome courts, and a fine staircase. The façade of San Pablo is scarcely inferior in its lavish ornamentation. There are a number of ancient churches and convents, one of which, Santa Ana, has some paintings by Goya. Among secular edifices is the old royal palace, now used for administrative purposes. The house which Cervantes occupied from 1603 to 1606 is now owned by the state. Among pleasure grounds the fine park in the Campo Grande deserves mention. The university, which was founded in 1346, occupies a building of the seventeenth century, with a curious façade in the Baroque style. It has about 1400 students. Among other institutions of learning are an academy of arts and sciences. The manufactures of Valladolid comprise gloves, textiles, paper, pottery, foundry products, etc. There is considerable trade in grain. The city is the seat of the captain-general of Old Castile and of an archbishop. Valparaiso, vål-på-rī'so, a fortified seaport of Chile, capital of a province of its own name, and the most important commercial town of the western coast of South America, is situated on a large bay in the Pacific Ocean, 75 miles WNW. of Santiago, with which it is connected by rail. Lat. 33° 1′ 56″ S.; lon. 71° 41′ 45″ W. The Bay of Valparaiso, which is well sheltered on three sides, is bounded by an amphitheatre of heights, rising to 1600–1700 feet, on the slopes of which a considerable portion of the city is built. On its S. side are the spacious Nuevo Malecón and Gran Avenida, from which passes out one of the finest of the city's thoroughfares, the Avenida de las Delicias. The lower central section of the city is constituted by the Almendral, with regular and attractive streets, which contains the principal business-houses, the city park, the Plaza Victoria, and the national theatre. Northwestward of this section, in the quarter known as the Puerto (or Port), are the greater number of the public buildings and the vast warehouses which line the quays and docks. Narrow and crooked streets are still a feature of this part of the city. The newer sections of Valparaiso have an attractive modern appearance, the business quarters being massively built. Valparaiso has various academic and collegiate institutions, a naval school, school for marines, hydrographic bureau, museum of natural history, etc. Its industrial establishments comprise foundries, railroad- and machine-shops, sugar-refineries, breweries, distilleries, large bottling-works, and factories of various kinds. Among the city's monuments are those to Columbus, Wheelwright (who established steamship navigation on the Chilean coast), Thomas Cochrane (organizer of the Chilean navy), and Admiral Prat. Elevators connect the lower parts of the city with the villa section on the heights. Pop. in 1902, 142,282. During the Spanish domination Valparaiso was a place of very little note. In 1819 the population hardly amounted to 5000 souls.

Venango, a township of Crawford co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 495.

Venango, a township of Erie co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 1318.

Venaria Reale, vå-nå′re-å rå-å′lå, a town of Italy, 6 miles NW. of Turin. Pop. about 3500 (commune, 5500).

Vence, vôNss (L. Ventia), a town of France, in Alpes-Maritimes, 14 miles NE. of Grasse. It is noted for its figs. It existed in Roman times. In the Middle Ages it was the seat of a bishop and the venerable cathedral still survives. Pop. about 2500.

Vendée, vôN°′dā′, a river of France, an affluent of the Sèvre Niortaise. Length, 45 miles.

Vendée (La Vendée), a maritime department in the W. of France, formed out of part of the old Poitou, having on the W. the Bay of Biscay. Area, 2690 sq. m. Pop. in 1901, 441,311. The surface is level in the N. and W. portions, and marshy towards the coast, elsewhere undulating and in part elevated. There are considerable stretches of woodland. The department is watered by the Sèvre Nantaise, Sèvre Niortaise, Vendée, and other streams. More grain and wine are raised than are required for home consumption; other products are oats, potatoes, beets, and hemp. Large numbers of live-stock are reared. Coal is mined. Capital, La Roche-sur-Yon. At the time of the French Revolution the peasantry of La Vendée and the neighboring regions took up arms in the royalist cause. The insurrection, which broke out in 1793, was not completely suppressed until 1796. In 1815 there was a Vendean uprising against Napoleon.

Vendeuvre, vôN°′dUv′r′, a small town of France, in Aube, 13 miles W. of Bar-sur-Aube. It has an old castle.

Vendôme, vôN°′dōm′, a town of France, capital of an arrondissement in the department of Loir-et-Cher, on the Loir, 20 miles NW. of Blois and 110 miles by rail SSW. of Paris. The principal building is the church of the Trinity, dating from the twelfth century, with a splendid belfry in front of the portal. The ruins of the ancient abbey to which the church belonged are still visible. On the left bank of the river is a ruined eleventh-century castle. The town-hall was erected in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Vendôme has an old lyceum, with a chapel in the Flamboyant style, and an archæological and ethnographic museum, in front of which stands a statue of the poet Ronsard. Pop. in 1901, 6929 (commune, 9459).

Venedy, a post-village of Washington co., Ill., on the Louisville and Nashville R., 36 miles ESE. of St. Louis, Mo. Pop. in 1900, 177.

Vener, vå′nẹr, or Väner (Vänern), a lake in the SW. part of Sweden, the largest of the lakes of Europe after Ladoga and Onega, between lat. 58° 22′ and 59° 25′ N. Length, 95 miles; greatest breadth, about 50 miles, near its centre, where two peninsulas, extending into it from the N. and from the S., with a group of islands, fairly separate off a SW. section into what is known as Dalbo Lake. Area, about 2400 sq. m.; average elevation above the sea, 147 feet, the surface-level fluctuating to the extent of several feet. Lake Vener occupies a portion of the great transverse fracture or subsidence trough which marks the southern lake-region of Sweden. It receives a number of streams, the largest of which is the Klar (Klar-Elf), emptying into its N. end, and discharges into the Skagerrak through the Göta River (Göta-Elf). By means of this stream, the various sections of the Göta Canal, Lake Vetter, the Motala River, and other waters, a continuous navigable water-way has been established between the Skagerrak and the Baltic Sea. The lake is not particularly noted for its scenery. Greatest depth, about 290 feet.

Veneris Portus, the ancient name of PORTOVENERE.

Venersborg, vā'nērs-borg', a town of Sweden, capital of the län of Elfsborg, at the SW. extremity of Lake Vener, at the efflux of the Göta-Elf. Pop. in 1900, 6395.

Venetia (It. Venezia, vā-nä'tse-ä), a compartimento of the kingdom of Italy, in the extreme NE. Area, 9475 sq. m. It comprises the provinces of Belluno, Padua, Rovigo, Treviso, Udine, Venice, Verona, and Vicenza. Pop. in 1901, 3,134,467. This region was inhabited in ancient times by the Veneti, whence the name.

Venetia, a post-village of Washington co., Pa. The banking point is Washington. It has coal-mines. Pop. about 600.

Venev', a town of Russia, government and 28 miles ENE. of Tula, on the Venevka. Pop. in 1897, 5219.

Venezia. See VENETIA and VENICE.

Venezuela, vĕn'ĕz-wee'lą (Sp. pron. vĕn-ĕth-wā'lä; locally, vĕn-ĕs-wā'lä), a republic in the N. part of South America, bounded on the N. by the Caribbean Sea and the Atlantic Ocean, E. by British Guiana, S. by Brazil and Colombia, and W. by Colombia. Area, about 450,000 sq. m. Venezuela is properly divisible into three dominant physiographic regions: 1, the Guiana Highlands, lying S. and E. of the Orinoco River, and extending to the Parima and the Pacaraima mountains, which separate the republic from Brazil; 2, the region of the llanos, extensive plains which lie W. and N. of the Orinoco, and which slope down gradually from heights of 800 feet to the river; and 3, the lofty mountain region of the northwest and north, which is properly a continuation of the Eastern Cordillera of Colombia, and extends with a number of breaks into the Paria Peninsula. The most elevated portion of the Venezuelan Andes is constituted by the Sierra Nevada de Mérida, which culminates in the peaks of Concha and Coluna, both about 15,400 ft. in height. Immediately on the coast, in the neighborhood of Carácas, the range is known as the Sierra de Mar, or more properly the Cordillera de la Silla ("saddle range"), which rises in the Naiguata and the Silla to about 9000 ft. The Guiana Highlands are still largely unknown, but they appear to form a vast plateau, sloping northward to the Orinoco and southward to the Amazonian plains, and rising to heights of from 6000 to 11,000 ft. (Mount Icutu). The most noted summit in this region is Roraima, about 8600 ft., which stands in the extreme SE. angle on the frontier of British Guiana. The llanos, whose surface is composed of detrital material brought down from the neighboring mountain-chains, are of monotonous aspect, partially covered with vast primeval forests, and elsewhere open and with park-like scenery. Vast herds of cattle roam over the plains, and there are but few large villages and towns in the far interior. The people of this region, the llaneros, live chiefly by cattle breeding. A fourth natural region of Venezuela might be recognized in the low alluvial tract which lies NW. of the Andes, and is occupied in large part by the brackish, shallow lagoon or bay which is generally known as the Lake of Maracaibo. This large body of water, the mouth of which is closed by a bar, is now rapidly silting up.

The river-system of Venezuela is almost entirely comprised in the Orinoco and its tributaries,—the Apure, Arauca, Meta, Ventuari, Caura, and Caroni being the most important of these. The Cuyuwini, whose course is partly in the territory disputed with British Guiana, is in the E. The Casiquiare, in the S., connects the Orinoco with the Rio Negro, and thus establishes direct water communication with the Amazon. See ORINOCO.

The climate of Venezuela is largely zonal. The hot zone extends from sea-level to somewhat over 2000 feet elevation, having a mean annual temperature of 77°. On this follows the temperate zone, with one of the most delightful climates in the world, extending to 6500 ft. elevation, and having a mean temperature of about 65°. In this zone the temperature rarely falls below 58°, and only exceptionally rises above 78°. The cold zone, or tierra fria, is that of the still higher parts of the mountains, in the higher portions of which the mean annual temperature descends almost to the freezing point. The flora of Venezuela is exceedingly rich and varied, and comprises the dominant vegetable forms which belong to the South American tropics. Of the more important cultivated products, which constitute the chief natural resources of the country, are coffee, cacao, sugar-cane, cotton, cinchona, sarsaparilla, tobacco, and indigo. There are various kinds of dye-woods. Other tropical products are rubber, tonga-beans, copaiba, and vanilla. Venezuela is one of the largest coffee-producing countries of the world, the annual export of the bean being about 50,000 tons. Large quantities of cacao are also exported.

Nearly all the dominant types of the South American mammalian fauna are represented in Venezuela, including various forms of monkeys, the jaguar, puma, ocelot, sloth, ant-eater, tapir, and the sea-cow (or lamantin), which inhabits the lower Orinoco. Birds are found in large numbers, and are especially abundant about the pools and rivulets of the llanos, the flocks or garzeros of herons, cranes, storks, and ibises being a feature in the landscape of those regions. The serpents include the boa, anaconda, and several extremely venomous types. The rivers teem with edible and other fish, and the turtles are made economically valuable by the prodigious number of eggs which they lay.

The country is rich in metals and other minerals, including gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, sulphur, coal, and asphalt. Gold is mined principally in the Yuruari Territory in the E.; the quantity sent from this region in 1899 was 42,315 ounces (in 1884, 233,935 ounces). The asphalt deposits belong mainly to the state of Bermúdez, and seemingly bear some relation to those of the island of Trinidad. Petroleum seems to be fairly abundant in some of the western states (Los Andes). Iron is mined with some industry in the region of the Imataca Mountains, S. of the Orinoco delta. An active industry of Venezuela is that of pearl-fishing, which is carried on by the natives about the island of Margarita, and which yields an annual product valued at about $100,000.

The roads of Venezuela are still primitive, and most of the traffic of the country is carried on by means of mule-carts and pack-animals. There were in 1899 529 miles of railroad.

The executive power is vested in a president, who is elected for a term of six years by a federal council chosen from among its own members by the congress, and the legislature (congress) consists of a senate (representing the individual states) and a house of representatives. The constitution of 1901 recognized 20 states, 1 federal district, 4 territories, and 2 colonies: the states were Apure, Aragua, Barcelona, Barimas, Barquisimeto, Carabobo, Carácas, Cojedes, Coro, Cumaná, Guarico, Guyana, Maracaibo, Margarita, Maturín, Mérida, Portuguesa, Táchira, Trujillo, and Yaracuy. In 1904, following a readjustment of the domain, the states and territories were as follows: states of Aragua, Bermúdez, Bolívar, Carabobo, Falcón, Guarico, Lara, Mérida, Miranda, Táchira, Trujillo, Zamora, and Zulia; territories, Amazonas, Cristóbal Colón, Colón, Delta-Amacuro, and Yuruari; and the Federal District. Pop. in 1904, 2,639,671. The bulk of the inhabitants represent a mixture of Spanish, Indian, and negro blood. The pure whites constitute but a small fraction. There are many Indians. The language of the country is Spanish. The Roman Catholic church is the state religion. The chief cities are Carácas (the capital), Valencia, Maracaibo, Barquisimeto, Cumaná, Barcelona, Ciudad Bolívar, and Mérida. The principal ports of the republic are La Guayra and Puerto Cabello.

History.—Columbus reached the coast of Venezuela in 1498, and in 1499 Ojeda and Vespucci sailed along it. The settlement of the region by the Spaniards was begun early in the sixteenth century. The year 1810 witnessed the beginning of the struggle for independence in Venezuela. In the following year independence was proclaimed. In 1813 Bolivar, the leader of the patriots, having made his entry into Carácas, received the title of "Liberator." Venezuela and New Granada were constituted in 1819 the republic of Colombia. The victory of Bolivar and Páez at Carabobo in 1821 put an end to the Spanish power in this part of South America. In 1829 Venezuela constituted itself an independent republic.

Venezuela, Gulf of (also known as the Gulf of Maracaibo), an inlet of the Caribbean Sea, bounded westward by the peninsula of Goajira and eastward by the peninsula of Paraguana, immediately S. of which is that part of the basin called El Golfete. It extends N. and S. about 75 miles; extreme breadth, about 150 miles. It contains several small islands. It communicates on the S. with Lake Maracaibo.

Venice, vĕn'iss (It. Venezia, vā-nĕd'ze-ä; Fr. Venise, vẹh-neez'; Ger. Venedig, vĕn-ä'dig; L. Venetia), a fortified seaport of Italy, capital of the province of its own name, and the seat of a patriarch, situated in the Lagune (lagoons), a shallow bay of the Adriatic, 135 miles E. of Milan and 125 miles NNE. of Florence. Lat. of observatory, 45° 25′ 49″ N.; lon. 12° 21′ 15″ E. Venice stands on 117 small islands, formed by about 150 canals. A railway viaduct, 2 miles long, connects the city with the main-land. Long sand-dunes (lidi), on the outer side of the lagoons, fortified by bulwarks of masonry, serve as a protection against the sea. Large moles to aid in this work have been constructed. The chief entrances or ship-channels to the lagoons are the Porto di Lido (in the N.), Porto di Malamocco, and Porto di Chioggia (in the S). The islands upon which the city is built, on pile foundations, communicate with one another by about 400 bridges. The Grand Canal, about 2 miles in length, with an average width of about 200 feet, winds through the city from NW. to SE., dividing it into two principal parts. The Giudecca Canal, about a quarter of a mile wide, separates the Giudecca island, on the extreme S., from the city proper. Numerous streets and lanes (calli), for the most part narrow and intricate, render Venice a labyrinth to the pedestrian; but the innumerable gondolas and many little steamboats which traverse the water-ways afford an easy means of intercommunication.

The square of St. Mark (Piazza di San Marco) is the finest and most frequented part of the city. It is enclosed on three sides by most imposing buildings. The palaces on the NE. were formerly the residence of the nine procurators of the republic. The old wing on the N. (Procuratie Vecchie) was erected in 1496–1520; the new or S. wing (Procuratie Nuove) was begun in 1584; the Atrio or Nuova Fabbrica, on the W., was built in 1810. Along these three buildings extend arcades with cafés and shops. The former library, a superb building, begun by Sansovino in 1536, now forms, together with the Procuratie Nuove, the royal palace. Between the library and the royal garden is the Zecca or mint, built by Sansovino in 1536, bounding the W. side of the Piazzetta, an open place which extends from the square of St. Mark to the lagoon. On the E. of the square rises the magnificent church of St. Mark, begun in 830, reconstructed after a fire in 976, and remodelled in the eleventh and later centuries. This cathedral is unrivalled for the splendor of its interior,—its wonderful mosaics, its gorgeous altar-screen (the Palla d'Oro), its alabaster columns and encrusted marbles. Above the principal portal stand the celebrated four horses in gilded bronze, the only existing specimen of an ancient quadriga. In front of the church are three richly decorated pedestals, erected in 1505; on the S. are two ancient pilasters, with Greek monograms, which have stood here since 1256. On the N. is the marble sarcophagus of Daniele Manin, president of the republic in 1848–49. Opposite the cathedral, to the SW., rose the Campanile, the famous square bell-tower, 322 feet in height, which collapsed on July 14, 1902. It dated back to 888. A new one is being erected in its place. At the E. end of the Procuratie Vecchie stands the clock-tower, erected in 1496, with two giant figures in bronze on a platform striking the hours on a bell. A lofty gateway leads through the structure to the Merceria, the principal business quarter. The Palace of the Doges, facing the Piazzetta and the lagoon, said to have been begun about 814, has been destroyed by fire five times and successively reconstructed on a grander scale. Its magnificent court was begun in 1485. Among its world-famous features are the Scala dei Giganti, a richly ornamented flight of stairs, and the great council hall, in which the meetings of the nobili were held. The Bridge of Sighs, constructed in 1595–1605, connects the palace with the public prisons. Close to the palace and near the lagoon are two granite columns, erected in 1180, one bearing the winged lion of St. Mark, the other St. Theodore, the patron of the ancient republic, on a crocodile.

The Riva degli Schiavoni, a handsome quay, extends along the canal San Marco, the W. end of which narrows at the Dogana, the custom-house, into the Grand Canal, the principal artery of traffic, whose banks are lined with the palaces of the ancient aristocracy, many of them of the greatest architectural and historical renown. Among the most famous are the Palazzo Contarini-Fasan, dating from the fourteenth century; the Corner della Cà Grande, built by Sansovino in 1532; Rezzonico, in which Browning died; Pisani (fourteenth century); Pesaro, Foscari, Farsetti (twelfth century); Loredan (of equal antiquity); the Fondaco di Tedeschi, a German warehouse dating from the thirteenth century, now the post-office; Cà Doro, the most striking of the palaces in the Gothic style; Vendramin, in the early Renaissance style, one of the finest palaces in Venice; and Grimani, the masterpiece of Sanmicheli, now the court of appeals.

The most famous of the three bridges spanning the Grand Canal is the Rialto, built in 1588–92, which is lined with numerous shops. Beyond the bridge is the church of San Giacomo di Rialto, the oldest in Venice, said to have been built about 520, recently restored. Among other well-known churches are Santa Maria della Salute, a large domed structure, at the SE. extremity of the Grand Canal, erected in 1631–82, with a ceiling adorned by Titian; Madonna dell' Orto, with a beautiful façade and rich in paintings; Santi Giovanni e Paolo, the most imposing church next to St. Mark's, with the tombs of the doges; San Salvatore, containing Titian's "Annunciation" and a beautiful monument by Sansovino; Santa Maria Formosa, one of the oldest churches; Frari (Santa Maria Gloriosa dei Frari), one of the largest and most beautiful, begun in the fourteenth century, with the tomb of Titian; the domed San Giorgio Maggiore, begun by Palladio in 1560; Redentore, built by the same master; and San Sebastiano, with the tomb of Paul Veronese. San Rocco, built in 1490, and the neighboring Scuola di San Rocco, are rich in the works of Tintoretto.

The greatest of the monuments of Venice is the equestrian statue of Bartolommeo Colleoni, the work of Verrocchio (the fifteenth century). Among modern monuments may be mentioned those of Goldoni, Tommaseo, Sarpi, Garibaldi, and Victor Emmanuel. A colossal statue of Italy has recently been completed.

Venetian art in its historical development may best be studied in the academy (Accademia di Belle Arti), founded in 1798. The Museo Civico contains, in addition to paintings, valuable architectural, sculptural, and ethnographical collections. The arsenal, at the E. end of the city, founded in 1104, contains a remarkably complete collection of models of ships. In front of the building stand four antique lions, one of them with a Runic inscription. To the S. of the arsenal are the public gardens, a pretty park 20 acres in extent, laid out by Napoleon in 1807. Venice possesses astronomical and meteorological observatories, a royal institute of sciences, arts, and industries, an archæological museum (in the Palace of the Doges), nautical and technological institutes, an Armenian school, and a commercial college. The library of St. Mark's, until 1904 in the Palace of the Doges, but now in the Zecca, numbers over 400,000 volumes.

Venice has long been celebrated for its glass-wares (pearls, beads, mirrors, mosaics, etc.), made in the city and on the island of Murano, to the N. The industry, which for many years declined, has recently revived. The city is also noted for its laces, the manufacture of which is carried on principally on the island of Burano, to the NE. Other important manufactures are those of silks, tapestry, furniture, jewelry, artificial flowers, cotton-goods, machinery, railway-cars, and torpedoes. Ship-building is carried on in the harbor. Nearly 4000 vessels entered the port in 1902. The city has an extensive trade with the Orient.

The climate of Venice is warm in summer and foggy and humid in winter. Mean annual temperature, 56½°. The hygienic conditions have in recent years been improved, and the city has a good water supply, brought through an aqueduct under the lagoon. Pop. in 1881, 132,826; in 1901, 151,840.

History.—Venice is generally supposed to date from the middle of the fifth century A.D., but nothing definite is known regarding the beginning of its history. It appears to have come into existence as a place of refuge to the inhabitants of the neighboring regions at the time of the great migration of nations. It struggled into the position of a flourishing and independent little commonwealth amid the vicissitudes of domination through which the regions about the head of the Adriatic Sea passed. In 697 the office of doge (duke) was instituted. In 997 the doge assumed the title of duke of Venice and Dalmatia. The republic had a leading share in the partition of the Byzantine (Greek) Empire in 1204 and became a great power in the Mediterranean. The middle of the thirteenth century witnessed the beginning of the great wars between the republics of Venice and Genoa. Towards the close of the century Genoa destroyed the naval power of Pisa and henceforth Venice alone was her rival. At one time, in 1379, Genoa appeared to be on the point of crushing her adversary, but the long and fierce struggle was finally decided in favor of the proud republic of St. Mark, whose maritime power at the close of the Middle Ages overshadowed that of every state in Christendom. In the early part of the fifteenth century the republic added to its possessions in Dalmatia and the lands of the Greeks (part of the Morea, Negropont, Crete, Corfu, etc.) great possessions in Italy, including Vicenza, Verona, Padua, Brescia, and Bergamo. The state was now at the height of its power. The trade of Europe with the East was carried on in great part in Venetian vessels. The state was dragged down from its exalted position by the advance of the Turks, the armed onslaughts of her Italian neighbors and of foreign invaders, and the change in trade-routes wrought by the discovery of the sea-route to India by Vasco da Gama (1497–98). When the Turks had put an end to the Byzantine Empire by the conquest of Constantinople in 1453, the fate of Venice as a great ruling power in the eastern Mediterranean was sealed, although one important acquisition was made at this time (1473), that of the island of Cyprus. By the middle of the sixteenth century the Turks had swept away the Venetian rule in the Morea and the Archipelago. It was at this time, when the republic had declined from the zenith of its power, that Venetian art reached its culmination. The sixteenth century was the age of Titian, Tintoretto, Paul Veronese, and Palladio. It was now that the Queen of the Adriatic assumed her most palatial aspect. But the state declined steadily in political power and it lost its hold upon the commerce of the world. Cyprus was conquered by the Turks in 1571 and Crete was lost in 1669. In 1797 the Venetian republic was extinguished by Bonaparte. Most of its dominions were given to Austria. Austria had to surrender them to the French in the treaty of Pressburg in 1805, but recovered them in 1814. In 1815 the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom was constituted. In 1848 the Venetians rose in insurrection against the Austrians and there was a new but short-lived republic of St. Mark. In 1849 Venice was forced to surrender and the Austrian yoke was reimposed. In 1866 Austria was compelled to cede Venetia to Italy.

Vera Cruz, vĕr′a krooz (Mex. Span. pron. vȧ′rȧ krooss), a state of Mexico, bordering on the Gulf of Mexico and bounded by the states of Tamaulipas (on the N.), San Luis Potosí, Hidalgo, Puebla, Oaxaca, Chiapas, and Tabasco (the last-named on the SE.). The Tamesi (or Tampico) River forms the northern boundary with Tamaulipas. Area, 29,285 sq. m. The state lies entirely within the Tropics. The coast is generally low, level, and sandy, and indented by several large lagoons—Tampico (in the extreme N.), Tamiahua, and Alvarado—and a number of minor bays. Most of the streams that fall into the Gulf are obstructed by bars at their mouths. The interior, after the low belt of seashore is passed, rises gradually, and becomes clothed with magnificent forests or with pasturage and cultivated fields. The inner boundary is formed by the buttress of the great plateau (with minor ranges, Chiquihuite, etc., extending eastward), about which are ranged some of the loftiest volcanic summits of the republic (Orizaba, 18,250 feet; Cofre de Perote). The climate of the state is unhealthy along the coast-border, but invigorating on the highlands. The chief products are maize, wheat, tobacco, coffee, cacao, sugar, vanilla, tropical fruits, dye-woods, and rubber. The rubber-forests are very extensive on the lower areas. Córdoba claims one of the finest grades of coffee in the world. Capital, Jalapa. Chief ports: Vera Cruz and Coatzacoalcos. Pop. in 1900, 981,030.

Vera Cruz, a seaport town of Mexico, the chief city of the state of Vera Cruz, on the SW. shore of the Gulf of Mexico, 190 miles (direct) E. by S. of the city of Mexico, with which it is connected by rail. Lat. 19° 12′ N. The city, which is the chief port of the Mexican republic, occupies a low area of sand and marsh, and has been frequently subject to visitations of yellow fever. Improved sanitation, the construction of a sea-wall, and various other changes have latterly very materially bettered its condition, and the city is now fairly healthy. Vera Cruz, whose buildings and encircling wall are largely of coral (piedra de mucar), presents a striking appearance from the sea in its numerous domes and cupolas, but few of the ecclesiastical edifices are now longer used for the purposes for which they were originally constructed, most of them serving as stores and warehouses. Apart from the old government-house, custom-house, and the large hospital of Gutiérrez Zamora, it has hardly any buildings of note, and its central plaza is less attractive than in most Mexican cities. From the sea-side the city is measurably defended by the castle of San Juan de Ulúa, built upon an island about half a mile from the shore. The harbor, which until a few years ago was hardly more than a mere roadstead between the town and the castle, having neither good anchorage nor sufficient protection from N. winds, is now amply protected by moles and breakwaters, and has good wharfage and jetty accommodations and facilities for loading, unloading, and transshipment. The exports consist principally of ores, coffee, tobacco, hides and skins, dye-woods, drugs, and vanilla. The city has some manufactures (tobacco, textiles, iron, liquors, pottery). Steamships ply (direct) between Vera Cruz and a large number of the North and South American ports, the West Indies, and the ports of Europe. Vera Cruz was founded at the close of the sixteenth century. It was taken by General Scott in 1847. Pop. in 1900, 29,164. See VERA CRUZ, OLD.

Verdun, vĕR'dŭNⁿ' (anc. Verodunum), a town of France, capital of an arrondissement, in the department of Meuse, 28 miles N. of Bar-le-Duc, on the Meuse, which here becomes navigable. Verdun is strongly fortified, 11 forts encircling the town. The Avenue de la Gare and its extensions intersect the town from N. to S. The venerable cathedral, which has undergone many alterations, has fine windows. Adjoining it are the palace of the bishop and the Grand Séminaire. Among the various relics of the military history of Verdun is the Porte Chaussée, an ancient turreted gateway, now used as a military prison. The Promenade de la Roche affords a good view of the valley of the Meuse. The town has a museum and a library of 50,000 volumes. Among the products are confectionery and liqueurs. Verdun is the seat of a bishop. The city grew into importance in the Middle Ages, when it was included within the limits of the Holy Roman (German) Empire, rising to the position of a free imperial city. A considerable district about it was ruled by the bishops of Verdun. In 1552 Henry II. of France seized the city and bishopric and annexed them to his kingdom. On Nov. 8, 1870, the fortress surrendered to the Germans after a siege of some weeks. Verdun is memorable for the treaty concluded there in 843 between the grandsons of Charles the Great, who partitioned the Frankish realm between them. Pop. in 1901, 12,493 (commune, 21,360).

Vermont' ("green mountain"), the northwesternmost of the New England states of the American Union, bounded N. by Quebec (Canada), E. by New Hampshire (from which it is separated by the Connecticut River), S. by Massachusetts, and W. by New York, from which it is partly separated by Lake Champlain. There are in Lake Champlain a number of islands belonging to this state, including North Hero, Grand Isle, Isle Lamotte, Hog, Wood, Butler, Potter, Providence, Straw, Gull, Fishbladder, Savage, etc. The most important of these, with a peninsula which extends into the lake from Canada, constitute the county of Grand Isle. Vermont lies between the parallels of 42° 44′ and 45° 3′ N. lat., its length from N. to S. being 160 miles, and has an area of 9565 sq. m. (land area, 9135 sq. m.).

Face of the Country.—The greater part of the state is covered by the Green Mountains and their outliers, and is thus mountainous in character, but there are large areas, especially in the E. and in the W., of beautiful pastoral and agricultural country. The main chain of the Green Mountains enters the state from Massachusetts in the SW. section, and traverses it completely to the Canada boundary, giving off one or more large stems towards the centre of its course. The principal peaks are Mount Mansfield, in about lat. 44° 33′ N., 4364 feet; Camel's Hump, 4088 ft.; Shrewsbury Peak, 3737 ft.; Killington Peak, 4241 ft.; Ascutney, 3320 ft.; Equinox, 3816 ft.; Sterling, 3700 ft.; Ælous, Anthony, etc. The mountains are generally more rounded in outline than is usual among the Appalachians, and they are largely clad with dense forests, but afford rich and abundant pasturage.

Rivers and Lakes.—Apart from the Connecticut, there are no large or important streams associated with the state, but a number afford considerable water-power and are largely utilized in manufacturing pursuits. The more notable among these are the Winooski (or Onion), on which is situated Montpelier, the capital of the state, a tributary of Lake Champlain; Otter Creek and Poultney and Lamoille rivers, also tributaries of the same lake; the Missisquoi, Passumpsic, Wells, White, and West rivers, tributary to the Connecticut; and the Black and Barton rivers, flowing into Lake Memphremagog. The Hoosac River, a tributary of the Hudson, crosses the SW. corner of the state. Lake Champlain, whose discharge is northward into the St. Lawrence River through the Richelieu River, extends along the western boundary for about 110 miles. It affords important steam navigation, and is much visited for its beauty. The only other large lake of the state is Memphremagog, on the Canadian boundary-line.

Geology and Minerals.—Nearly the whole of Vermont belongs to the Azoic and Paleozoic periods, but there are limited Tertiary and Post-Tertiary deposits and an extensive capping of glacial drift. The mineral wealth of the state is important. It includes marbles of many grades (pure white, black, pale red, mottled, etc.), granite, slate, iron, copper, manganese, ochres, asbestos, and kaolin. Gold and silver have been obtained in small quantities at various points. Rutland affords a superior white marble, comparable to that of Carrara, and is the largest marble centre of the world, its quarries giving employment to several thousand men. The marble quarry at Proctor is the largest single quarry in the world. The quantity of marble produced in 1903 was more than one-half of the product of the entire United States. Fairhaven, Middlebury, Castleton, Isle Lamotte, Manchester, and other localities have also furnished fine qualities of marble; Roxbury, verd-antique; Brandon, a highly-valued brown hematite, besides manganese, kaolin, ochre (used for paint), marble, lime, and a brown lignite which is employed to some extent as fuel; Guilford, Northfield, Pawlet, and Poultney, building-slate; Grafton, soapstone; Strafford, rich pyrites, affording copperas and sulphuric acid; Barre and Brattleboro, granite. The mineral waters (chalybeate, sulphurous, or saline) of Clarendon, Alburg, Sheldon, Manchester, Putney, etc., have local and in some instances national repute in the treatment of disease. Vermont occupies after Pennsylvania the first place among the states of the Union in the value of its quarry products. The value of the granite quarried in 1903 was $1,810,179; of slate, $1,592,652; and of marble, $3,011,505.

Climate.—The climate of the state is on the whole severe, with a lingering winter, but the extremes of temperature on the lowlands (about —20° and 100°) are not as pronounced as in the adjoining states. At Burlington the normal mean January temperature is about 18°–20°; the July temperature, 70°. The summer heat rarely much exceeds 90°. Lake Champlain is usually frozen over for several weeks about the middle of the winter. The average annual rainfall varies from about 40 inches in the N. to 33 or 30 inches in the west-centre.

Agriculture.—In spite of its mountainous surface and its long and severe winters, Vermont ranks fairly well as an agricultural state. Much land which is inarable makes good pasture for sheep and cattle. Forests cover about two-fifths of the area of the state. Spruce, hemlock, pine, cedar, and fir among coniferous timber trees, and beech, oak, rock-maple, several species of birch, basswood, and other useful deciduous trees abound. The forests yield large quantities of lumber, fire-wood, tanners' bark, maple sugar, and charcoal. Hay, potatoes, hops, oats, rye, wheat, Indian corn, grass- and clover-seed, apples, and all the ordinary staples of agriculture are abundantly produced. For maple sugar no state excels Vermont. There are some tracts, however, with a cold and churlish soil, particularly in the NE. and in the more mountainous townships. As a rule, the western slopes of the mountains and the intervale lands on the Connecticut and on Lake Champlain have the best soils. The leading agricultural crops in 1900 were: corn, 1,939,080 bushels; wheat, 81,992 bushels; oats, 3,719,677 bushels; barley, 500,811 bushels; rye, 47,924 bushels; buckwheat, 238,375 bushels; potatoes, 3,305,244 bushels; and hay, 1,066,524 tons. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 1,112,792 pounds.

Industries.—One of the leading industries of the state is the manufacture of lumber and timber products, which in 1900 were valued at $6,131,808. The planing-mill products were valued at $2,598,581. Other industries are the making of wood-pulp and paper (at Bellows Falls principally) and the manufacture of monuments and tombstones, of cottons and woollens, machine-shop products, hosiery and knit goods, roofs and roofing materials, stone-ware, fire-brick, musical instruments, agricultural implements, boots and shoes, etc. Of considerable importance is the manufacturing of dairy products,—cheese, butter, and condensed milk.

Railroads.—In 1850 Vermont had 290 miles of railroad; in 1855, 527 miles; in 1860, 554 miles; in 1865, 589 miles; in 1870, 614 miles; in 1875, 810 miles; in 1880, 912 miles; in 1885, 948 miles; in 1890, 988 miles; in 1900, 1029 miles.

Counties and Cities.—There are 14 counties, as follows: Addison, Bennington, Caledonia, Chittenden, Essex, Franklin, Grand Isle, Lamoille, Orleans, Orange, Rutland, Washington, Windham, and Windsor. The principal cities and towns are: Burlington (pop. in 1900, 18,640), Rutland (11,499), Barre (8448), Montpelier, the capital (6266), St. Albans (6239), St. Johnsbury (5666), and Bennington (5656).

Education.—The University of Vermont and the state agricultural college are at Burlington. Other collegiate institutions are Norwich University, at Northfield; Middlebury College, at Middlebury; and the Montpelier Seminary. There are state normal schools at Castleton, Randolph, and Johnson.

Government, etc.—The governor and the principal executive officers are elected for a term of two years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives. The counties are represented in the senate according to their population. Each town (township) is represented by 1 member in the house of representatives. The state sends 2 members to the lower house of Congress.

The population in 1790 was 85,425; in 1800, 154,465; in 1810, 217,895; in 1820, 235,981; in 1830, 280,652; in 1840, 291,948; in 1850, 314,120; in 1860, 315,098; in 1870, 330,551; in 1880, 332,286; in 1890, 332,442; in 1900, 343,611. The foreign-born population in 1900 numbered 44,474, of whom somewhat more than one-half were Canadians.

History.—Champlain discovered the lake which bears his name in 1609. In 1724 the government of Massachusetts built Fort Dummer near the present site of Brattleboro. Part of the country was held by Massachusetts to lie within her limits. Soon after the middle of the century numerous settlements sprang up under the auspices of the New Hampshire government, which claimed jurisdiction in the region. New York laid claim to the country as far E. as the Connecticut River by virtue of the charter granted to the Duke of York. George III. decided in favor of New York in 1764. Acts of hostility towards the New York authorities took place. In 1777 the people declared themselves independent and drew up a state constitution. In 1791, after much opposition on the part of New York, Vermont was admitted into the Union, the first state added to the original thirteen.

Verona, vâ-ro'nâ, a fortified city of Italy, capital of the province of Verona, situated at the base of spurs of the Tyrolese Alps, on both banks of the Adige, 62 miles W. of Venice and 22 miles NNE. of Mantua. Verona is, next to Venice, the most important town of Venetia, and is distinguished by its striking mediæval palaces, many of whose façades are adorned with sculptures and frescoes, now more or less effaced. The rapid Adige is enclosed by high embankments and spanned by six bridges. The city was strongly fortified by the Venetians early in the sixteenth century, and after 1814 fresh works were constructed by the Austrians, the fortress forming with Peschiera, Mantua, and Legnago, the famous "Quadrilateral." On the right bank of the river are the picturesque Piazza delle Erbe, the ancient forum; the Piazza dei Signori, with the Prefettura, formerly the residence of the Scaligers, and the magnificent Palazzo del Consiglio, erected in the fifteenth century by Fra Giocondo and containing the statues of famous modern and ancient Veronese. The Lungadige Panvinio, a broad quay, extends along the right bank of the river. SW. of it is the Corso Cavour, one of the most frequented streets, with the handsome Palazzo Bevilacqua, designed by Sanmicheli. Other noted palaces are the Raggione, dating from 1183, now the seat of the jury court, with a grand flight of steps, dating from the fourteenth century; the Maffei (now Trezza), with a remarkable spiral staircase; and the superb Palazzo Pompei (on the left bank of the river), by Sanmicheli, now containing the Museo Civico. The Castel Vecchio, at the W. end of the Corso, is connected by a pinnacled bridge, dating from the fourteenth century, with the left bank of the Adige. S. of the Corso is the Piazza Vittorio Emanuele, with the famous Roman amphitheatre erected under Diocletian, which measured 504 feet in greatest diameter and had forty-three tiers of steps; to the W. are the old guard-house (Gran Guardia Vecchia), now used as the corn market, and the Portoni, an old gateway. The Via Nuova Lastricata and the Via Nuova, NE. of the Piazza Vittorio Emanuele, form together the principal thoroughfare. To the S. is the Arco de' Leoni, an ancient Roman gateway. Other famous gates on the right bank of the river are the Porta del Palio and the Porta de' Borsari, a triumphal arch erected under the emperor Gallienus. On the left side of the Adige, to the E., is the Giardino Giusti, a beautiful garden. To the N. is the Castel San Pietro, modern barracks erected on the site of an ancient Ostrogothic castle. Among the churches are Santa Maria Antica, celebrated for the Gothic tombs of the Scaligers; the cathedral (Duomo), a Gothic edifice, erected in the fourteenth century, containing Titian's Assumption; San Zeno Maggiore, one of the noblest Romanesque churches in northern Italy, dating from 1139; and the ancient churches of Santa Maria in Organo, rebuilt by Sanmicheli in the fifteenth century; and San Giorgio in Braida, with fine works of Veronese and Brescian painters. Among the curiosities of Verona, the reputed home of Romeo and Juliet, are the "tomb of Juliet," and a memorial tablet over the gateway of an old house, near the Piazza delle Erbe, marking the supposed residence of the Capuletti, Juliet's parents.

The institutions of Verona comprise academies of painting and sculpture, a municipal library (160,000 volumes), the Museo Civico, rich in works of Veronese art and containing valuable collections of natural history and antiquities; the Museo Lapidario, with ancient marbles and classic inscriptions; and the Biblioteca Capitolare, with precious palimpsests. The city existed under its present name in ancient times and figures in the period following the fall of the Roman Empire. It was prominent among the city-states of Italy in the latter part of the Middle Ages. From a republic it was transformed into a principality under the famous house of Scala, one of whose members, Can Grande de la Scala, is celebrated as a patron of Dante. Under this dynasty Verona held sway over a considerable district. In 1405 it passed under the dominion of Venice. From 1797 to 1805 and from 1814 to 1866 it belonged to Austria. In 1822 the Great Powers held a congress at Verona, which decreed the restoration of absolutism in Spain, whose king, Ferdinand VII., had driven his subjects to rebellion by his tyrannical acts. Pop. in 1901, 74,271.

Versailles, vẽr-sälz' (Fr. pron. vĕr'sī'), a town of France, capital of the department of Seine-et-Oise, 10 miles SW. of Paris. Versailles is laid out in rectangular streets and presents, on the whole, a monotonous appearance. It is intersected from N. to S. by the wide Avenue de Paris, which leads to the Place d'Armes, where the two other principal thoroughfares, the avenues St. Cloud and Sceaux, converge. Among the churches, the cathedral of St. Louis is the most noteworthy. The most striking monuments are those of General Hoche and the Abbé de l'Épée. The palace to which Versailles owes its fame was built by Louis XIV. in 1672, and served as his residence and that of his successors until the Revolution. It consists of a central square and three wings. The marble court and the interior are famous for their splendor, and the museum and galleries contain pictures and statues of great historical and artistic interest. In the Galerie des Glaces William I. was proclaimed German Emperor. The park, laid out in the formal style of the gardens of the Renaissance, is rich in terraces, basins, vases, marble statuary, etc. The playing of the fountains, the largest of which is the Bassin de Neptune, is one of the great attractions of the park. Connected with it are the celebrated orangery and a school of horticulture. To the north are the Grand and Petit Trianon, two charming palaces, the latter the favorite residence of Marie Antoinette. Versailles has an artillery school and a library of 160,000 volumes. The town is the seat of a bishop.

England concluded a treaty of peace at Versailles with France and Spain on Sept. 3, 1783, on which day the treaty of Paris was signed in which she recognized the independence of the United States. The States General, convened for the first time after an interval of 174 years, assembled here in 1789,—the opening act of the French Revolution. It was at Versailles that the unification of Germany was formally consummated by the proclamation of William I. as German Emperor on Jan. 18, 1871. The preliminaries of peace between France and Germany were signed here on Feb. 26, 1871. From the close of the Franco-German war until 1879 Versailles was the seat of the French government. Pop. in 1901, 44,291 (commune, 54,982).

Vesuvius (It. Vesuvio, vā-zoo've-o), a mountain of southern Italy, and the only truly active volcano on the continent of Europe, rises up in striking grandeur from the plains of Campania, on the E. side of the Bay of Naples, about 10 miles E. by S. of the city of Naples. Its height varies usually from 3900 to 4300 feet (4360 ft. in Aug., 1905), depending upon material being added to or removed from the summit as the result of the volcano's activities. The mountain portion (as distinguished from the cone) swells up in a gentle undulation of 10–15 degrees gradient, and is largely scarred by great traversing lava-fields. Much of the famous lacrimæ Christi vine is cultivated on these lower slopes. The surmounting cone of loose volcanic ejecta (scoriæ, ash, etc.), with a height of 1400–1500 ft., now ascended by a cable railway, rises abruptly at an angle of 30–35 degrees. Its summit aspect varies at frequent intervals, a fairly deep crateral pit being sunk into it at times, while at other times it is solid-topped, with a minor vent carried on an outer eminence. Vesuvius is flanked on the land side by Monte Somma, a semicircular mountain or ring, which some geologists have assumed to be the actual volcano whose disruption in the year A.D. 79 overwhelmed Pompeii and Herculaneum, and in whose centre the new Vesuvius was built up as the result of the eruption. A part of this mountain bears the name of Monte Ottajano, and its highest point is the Punta del Nasone, 3730 ft. The deep sickle-shaped valley which separates Monte Somma from Vesuvius, and into which the rocks of Somma plunge almost vertically, is the Atrio del Cavallo. The earliest recorded eruption of Vesuvius is that of the year 79 (Aug. 24, 25), described in two letters of Pliny the Younger, addressed to Tacitus the historian, and to which the destruction of Pompeii, Herculaneum, and Stabiæ is attributed. There was at the time no lava-flow. There were violent eruptions in the years 203, 472, 512, and 982. The first recorded discharge of liquid lava took place in 1036. Since then various eruptions, some of them extremely violent, have occurred. Among them may be specified those of 1631 (overwhelming Torre Annunziata, Torre del Greco, Resina, Portici, Bosco), 1707, 1767, 1779, 1794, 1804, 1805, 1822, 1834, 1838, 1847, 1850, 1855, 1858, 1861, 1867–68, 1872 (unusually violent), 1876, 1895, 1903, 1905. A famous meteorological and seismological observatory is located on a westerly shoulder of the mountain at an elevation of 2220 ft.

Vicenza, ve-chẽn′zå (anc. Vicetia, Vicentia), a town of Italy, capital of the province of its own name, on the Bacchiglione, 40 miles W. of Venice. Vicenza, with its encircling wall, its many striking edifices and attractive surroundings, is one of the most interesting places in northern Italy. On the Piazza de' Signori, a handsome square, stands the Basilica Palladiana, the work of Palladio, with its famous grand colonnades enclosing the Palazzo della Ragione (town-hall). Near by is the Municipio, also by Palladio. Other noteworthy structures designed or erected by the same master are the Teatro Olimpico (finished in 1584, after his death); the Palazzo Chiericati, one of his finest edifices (containing the municipal museum); the imposing Palazzo Porto-Barbarano, the Palazzo Valmarano, and the Casa del Diavolo, left unfinished. The church of Madonna del Monte (dating in part from the fifteenth century), the Duomo or cathedral (with interesting chapels), the Dominican church of Santa Corona, and the handsome Gothic San Lorenzo, all contain striking examples of Mantegna's art. In the last-named church is the tomb of this painter. Santo Stefano has a beautiful Madonna by Palma Vecchio. The handsome Renaissance episcopal palace has an arcade dating from the fifteenth century. Near the town, at the E. base of Monte Berico (whence a beautiful view of Vicenza and the Venetian Alps may be obtained), is the famous Rotonda Palladiana, now in a state of decay, a square building, with a domed hall, approached by Ionic colonnades. Near by are the Villa Fogazzaro and the Villa Valmarano, with frescoes by Tiepolo. In the cemetery, to the NE. of the town, is the tomb of Palladio.

Victoria, a river of Queensland, Australia, is a tributary of the Cooper.

Victoria, a British colony, forming one of the states of the Australian commonwealth, and occupying the SE. part of the continent. It is bounded on the N. by New South Wales (almost the whole boundary on this side being formed by the Murray River), on the SE. and S. by the Pacific Ocean, Bass Strait, and the Indian Ocean, and on the W. by South Australia. Area, 87,884 sq. m., or only $\frac{1}{24}$ part of the total area of Australia. The state is traversed for the greater part of its length by the Great Dividing Range, which in different parts bears the names of Pyrenees (W. of Ballarat), and the Hume, Barry, and Bowen mountains, all virtually continuations of the Australian Alps of New South Wales. The loftiest summits are Bogong, 6508 feet; Feathertop, 6303 ft.; Hotham, 6100 ft.; and Cobberas, 6025 ft. In the extreme W. the Grampians and the Victoria Range are disposed in axial lines more or less transverse to the main chain. None of the summits rise to the line of perpetual snow, and such indications of glacial action as exist pertain to a past geological period. In the western, or what is known as the Portland district, in the basin of the Glenelg, there are numerous cones and buttresses 1000–2000 ft. in height, together with well-preserved craters, of extinct volcanoes. The chief rivers of Victoria are the Murray and its tributaries (Loddon, Campaspe, Goulburn, Ovens, and Mitta Mitta), the Snowy River (in the E.), La Trobe (in the SE.), Yarra Yarra (which discharges into the large indentation on the S. coast known as Port Phillip Bay), Glenelg (discharging into Discovery Bay on the SW.), and Wimmera (in the W., which loses itself in the sand). Of these streams only the Murray and the Goulburn are navigable for any distance. In the extensive western and northwestern region of grass, scrub (mallee bush), and sand, known as the Wimmera District, a large number of salt and freshwater lakes are scattered about, the best known being Hindmarsh and Albacutya (through both of which the Wimmera flows) and Tyrrell, the last-named receiving a river of the same name.

The climate of Victoria, despite extremes of summer heat (110° has been exceptionally noted), is the mildest or most temperate of any section of Australia, the average annual temperature being about 57°, and the winter temperature (June, July, August), only at rare intervals descending much below the freezing point (Melbourne minimum, 27°). The average annual rainfall ranges from about 15 inches in the NW. to 25 and 30 inches in the E. (at Melbourne, 20–25 inches). The plains of Victoria present a generally park-like aspect where the vegetation is comparatively sparse and where there is a rapid gradation to the open pasture-country and to the heath and partially desert tracts. The mountain-slopes, ravines, and gorges, on the other hand, display a forest of rare beauty and exuberance,—of almost impenetrable tree-ferns, acacias, and the gigantic eucalyptus (or blue-gum). Especially marked is the wealth of vegetable growth in the eastern maritime district known as Gippsland, where the eucalyptus attains to proportions rivalled only by the sequoias of the western United States.

The chief resources of the colony are mining and wool-raising. The number of sheep in the colony in 1901 was 10,841,790; the product of wool, of an unusually fine grade, in 1903 was 51,606,597 pounds, valued at £1,945,872. The Victorian gold-fields have furnished probably not less than two-thirds of the total gold product of Australia. The aggregate value of the gold mined between 1851 (when the discovery of the metal was made) and 1903 was upward of £266,000,000. The product in 1903 was 822,424 ounces, valued at £3,262,282. The number of miners employed in the gold-fields in 1903 was estimated at 25,852. Victoria furnishes some good coal, as much as 200,000 tons having been mined in a single year (64,000 tons in 1903). Tin has been mined in small quantity. Considerable live-stock (horses), fruit, and agricultural produce are exported, but the manufactures supply as yet chiefly a home demand. There were in 1903 3401 miles of railway in operation. Capital, Melbourne. Pop. in 1901, 1,201,070.

The governor of Victoria is appointed by the crown. The parliament consists of a legislative council and a legislative assembly. The colony of Victoria was organized in 1851. On Jan. 1, 1901, it became a state of the commonwealth of Australia.

Victoria Falls (or Mosi-Oa-Tunya,—i.e., "the smoke that sounds"), in the Zambezi River, Rhodesia (southern Africa), about 225 miles (direct) NW. of Buluwayo and reached by railway from that point. They vie with the Niagara Falls in grandeur and surpass them in height. The width of the chasm into which the fall is precipitated is about 1860 yards. The fall is broken by several islands and rocks (Boaruka and Livingstone islands being the largest), and in its highest parts (on the W. and E. sides) drops 256 and 343 feet. What is known as the "main fall" is 573 yards across. Below the falls the river is carried away in a tortuous cañon. The Victoria Falls were discovered by Livingstone in 1855. A great single-span railway bridge, the most elevated structure of its kind in the world, with the rails 420 feet above the water, has been constructed across the gorge immediately below the falls.

Victoria Land, or South Victoria, the name given to that portion of the supposed Antarctic continent, S. of New Zealand, which bounds Ross Sea on the W. It extends southward from Cape Adare (somewhat E. of lon. 170° E.) to the farthest point that has been reached (82° 17′ S.) or seen by man, and with undefined limits westward. A lofty range or series of snow-covered mountains, giving origin to numerous glaciers, follows the coast in a general meridional direction, and rises in summits to 6000 and 9000 feet (Mount Melbourne) in elevation, with some points rising considerably higher (Mount Longstaff, in the extreme S., about 15,000 feet). In about lat. 77° 30′ S. are the lofty detached volcanoes, Erebus and Terror, the former of which was in a state of moderate activity in 1900, when seen by Borchgrevink, and again in 1902, when observed by Scott. The volcano was in the same condition when discovered by Ross in 1841. Victoria Land rises rapidly westward into what would appear to be an ice-plateau similar to that of the interior of Greenland, having a general elevation of 8000–9000 feet. On the coast-border much of the land is devoid of snow during the summer, but the vegetation that responds to possibilities of growth is virtually all of lower types,—the mosses and lichens. A very few insects have been observed with these. See ANTARCTICA.

Victoria Nyanza, or Ukerewe, oo-kĕr-ā′wĕh, a lake of east-central Africa, the principal feeder of the Nile, lies between lat. 0° 38′ N. and 3° S., and between (approx.) lon. 31° 45′ and 34° 52′ E. (Kavirondo Bay). Its area is almost equally divided between British East Africa and German East Africa. Elevation above the sea, 3775 feet; greatest depth, seemingly not exceeding 240 ft. Area, about 26,000 sq. m.; that of the catchment basin, computed to be 70,000 sq. m. additional. The lake's most important tributary is the Kagera, in the W., now generally assumed to be the ultimate headstream of the Nile. The Ripon Falls, about 1200 ft. across, mark the discharge of the Nile (known at this point as the Somerset Nile) from the lake. The Victoria Nyanza was discovered by Speke in 1858. It is now navigated by one or more small steamboats, and its NE. shore is reached, at Port Florence, by the Uganda railway. The lake contains a number of islands, the largest of which is Ukerewe in the S.

Vienna, ve-ĕn′na (Ger. Wien, ŵeen; Fr. Vienne, ve-ĕnn′; anc. Vindobona), the capital of Austria-Hungary, of the Cisleithan half of the monarchy, and of the province of Lower Austria, situated on the right bank of the Danube, 330 miles in a direct line SSE. of Berlin. Lat. of the new observatory, 48° 13′ 55″ N.; lon. 16° 20′ 22″ E. It stands in a plain bordered by spurs of the Styrian Alps, the Wienerwald, terminating abruptly in the Kahlenberg (1404 feet above sea-level) and the Leopoldsberg. The elevation of the Danube here above the sea is 525 feet. The Donaukanal or Danube Canal, a southern arm of the river, traverses the city. It receives the small river Wien, recently vaulted over to a considerable extent, and the Alser and Ottakringer creeks. The city has since 1890 been divided into 20 districts: Innere Stadt (the old city), Leopoldstadt, Landstrasse, Wieden, Margarethen, Mariahilf, Neubau, Josefstadt, Alsergrund, Favoriten, Simmering, Meidling, Hietzing, Rudolfsheim, Fünfhaus, Ottakring, Hernals, Währing, Döbling, and Brigittenau. The modern aspect of Vienna dates from 1858, when the high walls which formerly surrounded the Innere Stadt and separated it from the suburbs (Vorstädte) were demolished. On the site of the walls and trenches has arisen the Ringstrasse, the most imposing modern street in all Europe, about 3 miles long, laid out in a succession of boulevards which encircle the Innere Stadt. In the SW. part of the Innere Stadt, near the Ringstrasse, is the Hofburg (or imperial palace), an extensive and irregular pile of buildings, the oldest part of which, the Schweizerhof, dates from the thirteenth century. A beautiful curved façade was completed in 1893. The recent reconstruction of the Hofburg includes the addition of two large wings at the south gate, the outer Burgthor. The principal edifices on or near the Ringstrasse are the magnificent Gothic Rathaus, or town-hall, with many statues and a tower 320 feet in height; the two domed imperial museums (of natural history and of art) in the Italian Renaissance style, identical in appearance; the Votivkirche, one of the finest of modern Gothic churches, erected in 1856–79; the university, a large Tuscan Renaissance structure, with arcades in its quadrangular court; the Houses of Parliament, the meeting-place of the Reichsrat of Cisleithania, in the Greek style; the Palace of Justice; the imperial opera-house, a splendid Renaissance building, with sumptuous interior decorations; the Hofburgtheater, in the later Renaissance style; the Deutsche Volkstheater; the Künstlerhaus, with permanent exhibitions of paintings; the Handelsakademie (commercial academy); the Musikvereins-Gebäude (containing the conservatory of music), the imperial Academy of Art, the exchange, and the Sühnhaus (or "expiatory building"), erected by the emperor in commemoration of the burning of the Ringtheater in 1881, whose site it occupies. The palaces of the archdukes Ludwig Victor, Eugen, and Friedrich deserve mention. The last-named structure stands on the Augustiner-Bastei, one of the few remnants of the old bastions. Fronting on the Ringstrasse are the Stadtpark, an attractive pleasure-resort, about 32 acres in extent, with a pretty Kursalon and the striking statues of Schubert and the painter Schindler; the Volksgarten, near the Hofburg, with the handsome Grillparzer monument; the imperial Hofgarten, and the Rathauspark, encircling the Rathausplatz, a most imposing square. On the Schwarzenbergplatz rises the equestrian statue of Field-marshal Schwarzenberg. Besides these monuments, there are in this vicinity statues of Beethoven (by Zumbusch), of Schiller (by Schilling), and of Goethe (by Hellmer), and the charming Mozart monument, by Tilgner. The imposing monument to Maria Theresa, by Zumbusch, occupies the space between the two imperial museums. On the outer Burgplatz are the equestrian statues of Archduke Charles and Prince Eugene of Savoy, both by Fernkorn. The centre of the Innere Stadt is the crowded Stephansplatz, with the cathedral, one of the most magnificent specimens of Gothic architecture, dating mainly from the fourteenth century. The great tower, completed in the fifteenth century, is about 470 feet high. The cathedral has been largely restored since 1852. The principal thoroughfares extending from the Stephansplatz are the Kärntnerstrasse and the Graben, with handsome shops. The Kohlmarkt, another crowded street, leads from the Graben to the Hofburg. Near by is the Herrengasse, with stately palaces of the aristocracy. Notable squares in the Innere Stadt are the Hohe Markt, with a votive monument by Fischer von Erlach; the Neue Markt, with a handsome fountain by Raphael Donner; the square Am Hof, the largest in this district, and the Freiung, with a fine fountain by Schwanthaler. Among the churches in the Innere Stadt, besides those already mentioned, are Maria-Stiegen, dating in part from the fourteenth century; the Augustiner-Kirche, with the famous monument to the Archduchess Christine by Canova; the Capuchin church, with the tombs of the members of the Hapsburg family; and the Peterskirche, built in imitation of St. Peter's at Rome. Not far from the Ringstrasse is the domed Karlskirche, in the Italian baroque style, with two colossal columns in front of the portico.

A number of bridges lead across the Wien and the Donaukanal from the Innere Stadt to the other districts. The Franz-Josefs-Quai, with handsome modern edifices, extends along the Donaukanal and leads to the Ringstrasse. The principal thoroughfare in the second district (Leopoldstadt), which lies NE. of the Innere Stadt, beyond the Donaukanal, is the Praterstrasse (formerly Jägerzeile), which terminates in the Praterstern. From there stretches eastward the Prater, a natural park, 4270 acres in extent, with avenues frequented by the fashionable world and others devoted to amusements for the people, the whole presenting on summer evenings a scene of extraordinary animation. The fine station of the Northern railway (Nordbahnhof) is situated in the Leopoldstadt. NW. of this district is the Augarten, a park of 125 acres, in the French style. In the NE. a new quarter, the Donaustadt, has arisen, as a result of the Danube improvement works, which have provided a broad, new channel for the river, and thus eliminated the annual danger of inundation to which this part of the city had formerly been exposed. The third district (Landstrasse) contains the Belvedere, a château erected originally for Prince Eugene of Savoy, and now occupied by the heir-presumptive, Archduke Franz Ferdinand. Adjoining the terraced garden of the Belvedere, laid out in the French style, is the Schwarzenberg garden, with the Schwarzenberg palace.

Vienna is rich in institutions of learning. The university, founded in 1365, occupies a foremost position in medicine. The number of students in 1904 was 6205. Connected with the university are astronomical and meteorological observatories, various museums and laboratories, and a botanical garden. The polytechnic institute has extensive chemical and physical collections. Among other institutions of high rank are the agricultural college, the academy of sciences, the geological institute, the conservatory of music, the military geographical institute, and the government printing-office. The imperial library, founded in 1440, has about 900,000 volumes, 24,000 manuscripts, and 350,000 engravings; that of the university, 650,000 volumes. The collection of manuscripts in the Oriental Academy is probably the richest of its kind in the world. The imperial picture-gallery in the art museum contains paintings by nearly all the great masters. Of great value also are the collections of the academy of art, of Prince Liechtenstein, and Counts Harrach, Schönborn, and Czernin. The famous Albertina collection of the archduke Friedrich comprises more than 200,000 engravings. The imperial chamber of treasures contains gems of priceless value. The imperial collections of coins and antiquities, as well as the cabinets of zoology and mineralogy, are of almost unrivalled completeness. Among other noteworthy collections are those of the municipal historical museum, the museum of Austrian ethnography, and the museum of art and industry. The armory of the arsenal has a remarkable collection of instruments and trophies of war. Among the charitable institutions, the general hospital, one of the largest in the world, the insane asylum, the foundling and maternity hospitals, and the institutions for the blind and the deaf-mute are the most prominent.

The surroundings of Vienna are noted for their charming scenery. The gardens of Schönbrunn, the imperial summer palace, are a favorite resort of the Viennese. The climate of Vienna is temperate, but very variable; mean annual temperature, 49°; mean temperature of July, 64°; of January, 28°. The city is the great commercial centre of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. The principal manufactures comprise silks and woollens, clothing, machinery, locomotives, railway cars, mathematical, surgical, and musical instruments, pianos, furniture, household utensils, articles of bronze, pottery, jewelry, leather goods, gloves, etc. The breweries of the city are famous. The population in 1890 (including the new districts) was 1,341,897; in 1900, 1,648,355. Within the last half-century the population (including annexations) has increased five-fold.

Vindobona was a station of the Roman legions in Upper Pannonia. Vienna rose into importance as the capital of the duchy of Austria. In 1365 it became the seat of a university, the second in the territories of the Holy Roman (German) Empire, its predecessor having been that of Prague. From the middle of the sixteenth century Vienna was the virtual capital of the German Empire down to its extinction in 1806. The city successfully withstood sieges by the Turks in 1529 and 1683. On the second occasion it was relieved by the forces of the Polish king, John Sobieski, and a German army, which overwhelmed the Turks in a great battle before its walls. In 1814–15 the Congress of Vienna was held to reorganize the political system of Europe on the downfall of Napoleon.

Vienne (anc. Vienna), a town of France, capital of an arrondissement, in the department of Isère, 54 miles WNW. of Grenoble, on the left bank of the Rhone, at the influx of the Gère. It is irregularly built and unattractive in some of its parts, its chief interest being due to its Roman remains. Among these the most striking is the temple of Augustus and Livia, a building similar in structure to the famous Maison Carrée at Nîmes. Some colossal Roman arches are considered the remains of a forum or of a theatre. The Plan d'Aiguille (popularly known as "Pilate's Tomb") is an ancient pyramid, probably a relic of a circus. The handsome Gothic cathedral of St. Maurice dates from the twelfth century. Its exterior, like that of the church of St. André-le-Bas, gives evidence of decay. The Romanesque church of St. Pierre, begun in the ninth century and thoroughly restored, contains now the Musée Lapidaire, with some interesting antiquities. The town-hall is a fine modern building. On the right bank of the Gère stands a colossal statue of the Virgin, erected in 1860. The town has manufactures of textiles, metallic articles, paper, etc. Pop. in 1901, 20,684 (commune, 24,619). Vienne was an important town under the Romans and in the Middle Ages. It figures as the capital of the kingdom of the Burgundians and of the kingdom of Cisjurane Burgundy. Virginia, a small town of Ireland, co. and 15 miles SE. of Cavan.

Virginia, a South Atlantic state of the American Union, one of the original thirteen states, is bounded NE. and E. by Maryland, the District of Columbia, and the Atlantic Ocean, S. by North Carolina and Tennessee, and W. and NW. by Kentucky and West Virginia. From Maryland it is separated, for the most part, by the Potomac River, from Kentucky by the Cumberland Mountains, and from West Virginia by a devious line which follows, in part, the crests of the Alleghany Mountains and other ridges of the Appalachian system. The state lies between lat. 36° 31′ and 39° 27′ N. Area of the land-surface, 40,125 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 2325 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—The state presents a great variety of surface, as exemplified in the mountain-region of the W.; the hilly "Piedmont Country" on its eastern flank, declining eastward to the "Middle District" and southeastward to the "South-Side;" the beautiful "Valley of Virginia," a portion of the "Great Valley" of the eastern United States, lying immediately W. of the Blue Ridge Mountains; the picturesque "Little Tennessee" country, in the SW.; the "Tide-water district," E. and SE. of the Piedmont region, and including the historic "Northern Neck" and the other "Peninsulas;" and lastly the detached "Eastern Shore," which lies on the eastern side of Chesapeake Bay. These all have local peculiarities of aspect,—the western portion having much sublime and inspiring scenery, the eastern slope great beauty and diversity of surface, and the tide-water counties a generally level surface, with a naturally fertile soil and a somewhat less healthful climate, owing to the existence of considerable swamp land. The greater portion of the Dismal Swamp is in the SE. part of the state. The Piedmont or "foot-hill" region has a general elevation of 500–1000 feet, and abuts abruptly upon the Blue Ridge, which is the dominant mountain-mass of the state, and represents structurally (in part, at least) the similarly-named mountains of Pennsylvania and Maryland and the Highlands of New York. South of the James River it flattens out in part into a broad plateau, corresponding to that of North Carolina, and here are located the highest summits of the state; among them Rogers Mountain, 5719 ft.; White Top, 5530 ft.; and Peaks of Otter, 4001 ft. The Blue Ridge extends completely across the state, and bounds on the E. the extremely fertile Shenandoah Valley (or Valley of Virginia), occupying an elevation of 700–1350 ft.—the "Piedmont of America," beyond which follow the ranges of the Alleghany and Shenandoah (or Kittatinny) Mountains, whose trend is NE. and SW., and which form direct continuations of the mountains of Maryland and Pennsylvania. Except in the extreme S. they rarely attain elevations much exceeding 3000 ft., but some of the summits rise to 4000 ft.

Bays, Rivers, etc.—Chesapeake Bay, Hampton Roads, and the noble estuaries of the Potomac, Rappahannock, York, and James afford excellent shipping facilities in eastern Virginia. The principal affluent of the Potomac is the Shenandoah; of the Rappahannock, the Rapidan; the York receives the Pamunkey and the Mattapony; the James is joined by the Appomattox and the Chickahominy. The Nottoway, Blackwater, and Meherrin flow into the Chowan in North Carolina, the Dan and the Staunton form the Roanoke, and in the SW. there are important affluents of the Tennessee (Holston) and Great Kanawha rivers. Several of the eastern tributary rivers receive the tides and afford some navigation, but less extensively than in colonial times, for the effect of agriculture has been to silt up many minor channels. The navigation of the James River has been supplemented by the construction of a canal along its upper course. In the SE. various canals afford commercial intercourse with the sounds of North Carolina.

Geology and Mineral Wealth.—A line running southward from Alexandria to Fredericksburg, Richmond, and Petersburg and the North Carolina boundary-line marks very nearly the limit of tide-water, and the boundary between the Azoic rocks of the Piedmont and the Tertiary and alluvial of the tide-water counties. The Archæan region is limited northwestward by the Blue Ridge, upon which rest several short N. and S. belts of the Triassic, and at several points the Triassic strata are coal-bearing. These Triassic coals are generally bituminous and of good quality, but some are native cokes of the highest excellence. The mountain and valley regions beyond the Blue Ridge display complicated successions of Paleozoic limestones, sandstones, and shales. In the southwestern counties there are beds of coal of true Carboniferous age, including anthracite, semibituminous, and bituminous coals. Virginia has gold, copper, lead, iron (in abundance), graphite, zinc, sulphur, salt, fire-clay, kaolin, gypsum in vast beds, fine granite, slate, marble, limestone, sandstone, flagstone, pyritous earth, marls, steatite, water-lime, and other useful but thus far not extensively utilized minerals. Rock salt is an important product of southwestern Virginia. The output of coal in 1903 was 3,451,307 short tons, valued at $3,302,149 (much the largest quantity mined being in Wise co., near the extreme SW.). The quantity of iron (brown hematite) mined is fairly large, but there has been a decrease in the production of late. In 1900 it amounted to nearly 500,000 short tons. The state abounds in medicinal springs of high and wide repute, chiefly in the mountain and Piedmont districts, and many of the localities where they occur are fashionable or much-frequented resorts.

Climate.—The climate of the state generally is temperate, with only moderate extremes of temperature in the lowlands and the lower mountain-valleys. The average January temperature varies from 32° to 37°; the mean of July is 72°–78°. The mountain counties have a short but somewhat severe winter, with long and delightfully cool summers. The tide-water country has many swampy tracts, which render it unhealthy during summer and autumn, except on salt-water channels and high grounds. But this region has a very mild winter climate. The annual rainfall varies from about 35 to 48 inches.

Forests.—Virginia has afforded much white oak, yellow pine, cedar, juniper, and cypress timber, besides hickory, ash, walnut, tulip, locust, chestnut, linden, etc. Dismal Swamp has afforded a great deal of timber, and the lumber interest of the state is still one of much importance, although the forests are being largely thinned or removed. In 1900 the forest area covered upward of 50 per cent. of the full land area of the state. Tanners' bark, sumach-leaves, fire-wood, charcoal, etc., are important forest products. The forests in many parts still abound in deer and other game.

Agricultural Resources.—The limestone lands of the charming Valley of Virginia and of "Little Tennessee" are of almost unsurpassed fertility, and the same is true of the marly soils of some of the river alluvions. These are admirably adapted to the growth of the cereals. Wheat and corn, and orchard fruits generally, do well in most parts of Virginia. Much of the tide-water region is given over to the cultivation of early vegetables, the greater portion of which is destined for the northern markets. Some cotton is also grown in this section. The chief agricultural crops in 1900 were: corn, 28,183,760 bushels; wheat, 9,421,932 bushels; oats, 5,167,568 bushels; rye, 370,125 bushels; buckwheat, 58,812 bushels; potatoes, 2,223,778 bushels; and hay, 589,133 tons. For stock-raising, wool-growing, and dairy-farming the state offers great facilities. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 1,790,360 pounds. No state in the Union, except Kentucky, equals Virginia in the amount and value of her ancient staple, tobacco.

Manufactures.—The manufacturing interests of the state have been of slow development; but the tobacco-works of Lynchburg, Richmond, and Danville, the flour-mills of Alexandria and Richmond, and the iron-establishments of Richmond and Norfolk have been in successful operation for many years. Extensive ship-yards and docks are located at Newport News. The values of the chief manufactured products in 1900 were: tobacco, $21,278,266; flour and grist-mill products, $12,687,267; lumber and timber products, $14,824,075; cars (including repairing), $6,277,279; iron and steel, $8,341,888; leather, $4,716,920; textiles, $3,282,583.

Fisheries.—The tidal waters of the state afford profitable fisheries of shad, bass, and other food-fishes, and the oyster-catch is of great pecuniary importance. The state has encouraged and protected these industries by appropriate legislation. Many oysters are shipped hence for planting in northern waters.

Objects of Interest to Tourists.—Under this head may be enumerated Luray Cave, in Page co.; Weyer's and Newmarket caves; the Natural Bridge, in Rockbridge co.; the Peaks of Otter, in Bedford and Botetourt cos.; Balsam Mountain; and the Natural Tunnel, in Scott co. The mountains of Virginia have a delightful summer climate and inspiring scenery. Old Point Comfort, on Chesapeake Bay and Hampton Roads, and Virginia Beach are well-known sea-side resorts.

Education.—The University of Virginia, near Charlottesville, is a state institution, founded by Jefferson, which takes a high rank among American universities. Other important institutions are Washington and Lee University, at Lexington, the Virginia Military Institute, at the same place, William and Mary College (the second oldest college in the United States), at Williamsburg, Emory and Henry College, at Emory, Hampden Sydney College, at Hampden Sydney, Richmond College and the Virginia Union University, at Richmond, Randolph-Macon College, at Ashland, Roanoke College, at Salem, the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, at Blacksburg, the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute (for colored and Indians), the Virginia Normal and Collegiate Institute at Petersburg, the Female State Normal School at Farmville, and the female colleges at Abingdon, Danville, Farmville, Lynchburg, and Petersburg. There are professional schools of high character in the state.

Railroads.—In 1850 there were 384 miles of railroad; in 1860, 1379 miles; in 1870, 1483 miles; in 1880, 1826 miles; in 1890, 3368 miles; in 1900, 3793 miles.

Counties and Cities.—The counties in 1900 were 100,—viz., Accomac, Albemarle, Alexandria, Alleghany, Amelia, Amherst, Appomattox, Augusta, Bath, Bedford, Bland, Botetourt, Brunswick, Buchanan, Buckingham, Campbell, Caroline, Carroll, Charles City, Charlotte, Chesterfield, Clarke, Craig, Culpeper, Cumberland, Dickenson, Dinwiddie, Elizabeth City, Essex, Fairfax, Fauquier, Floyd, Fluvanna, Franklin, Frederick, Giles, Gloucester, Goochland, Grayson, Greene, Greensville, Halifax, Hanover, Henrico, Henry, Highland, Isle of Wight, James City, King and Queen, King George, King William, Lancaster, Lee, Loudoun, Louisa, Lunenburg, Madison, Matthews, Mecklenburg, Middlesex, Montgomery, Nansemond, Nelson, New Kent, Norfolk, Northampton, Northumberland, Nottoway, Orange, Page, Patrick, Pittsylvania, Powhatan, Prince Edward, Prince George, Princess Anne, Prince William, Pulaski, Rappahannock, Richmond, Roanoke, Rockbridge, Rockingham, Russell, Scott, Shenandoah, Smyth, Southampton, Spottsylvania, Stafford, Surry, Sussex, Tazewell, Warren, Warwick, Washington, Westmoreland, Wise, Wythe, and York. There are a number of independent cities,—viz., Alexandria, Bristol, Buena Vista, Charlottesville, Danville, Fredericksburg, Lynchburg, Manchester, Newport News, Norfolk, Petersburg, Portsmouth, Radford, Richmond, Roanoke, Staunton, Williamsburg, and Winchester. The principal cities are Richmond, the capital (pop. in 1900, 85,050); Norfolk, the principal seaport (46,624); Petersburg (21,810); Roanoke (21,495); Newport News (19,635); Lynchburg (18,891); Portsmouth (17,427); Danville (16,520); Alexandria (14,528); and Manchester (9715).

Government, etc.—The governor and principal executive officers are chosen for a term of 4 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of delegates, the members of the former being elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. The state sends 10 members to the lower house of Congress.

The population in 1790 was 747,610; in 1800, 880,200; in 1810, 974,600; in 1820, 1,065,366; in 1830, 1,211,405; in 1840, 1,239,797; in 1850, 1,421,661; in 1860, 1,596,318; in 1870 (after the separation of West Virginia), 1,225,163; in 1880, 1,512,565; in 1890, 1,655,980; in 1900, 1,854,184. The negro population in 1900 was 660,722. The foreign-born in that year numbered only 19,461.

History.—The colony of Virginia, the first British colony planted in America, was founded in 1607 by a party sent out by the London Company. A little more than 20 years before this Sir Walter Raleigh had attempted to found a colony on the coast of what is now North Carolina and the name of Virginia had been bestowed on this part of the American continent by Queen Elizabeth. The first settlement was at Jamestown and the foremost man among the colonists was Captain John Smith. The early settlers were supporters of the Anglican church and of the royal supremacy, and among them were many persons of gentle birth. In 1619 a colonial assembly met at Jamestown, the first representative body convened in the New World. The same year witnessed the beginnings of negro slavery in the colony. In 1624 the colony was placed under the crown. Virginia played, by the side of Massachusetts, the leading part in the revolutionary struggle. In 1776 a state constitution was adopted. Down to the year 1810 Virginia was the most populous state of the Union. In April, 1861, Virginia joined the Confederate States, whose capital was established at Richmond. The state was the chief theatre of the operations of the Civil War. At the beginning of the conflict the western part of the state seceded from Virginia and in 1863 it was admitted into the Union as West Virginia. Reconstruction was completed in Virginia in 1870. Seven presidents of the United States (Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Wm. H. Harrison, Tyler, and Taylor) were natives of this state.

Vistula, vis′tu-lą (Ger. Weichsel, ŵīk′sęl; Pol. Wisla, ŵees′lä; anc. Vistula), a river of Europe, rises on the northern slope of the Carpathian Mountains (Beskids) of Austrian Silesia, about 20 miles SE. of Teschen. It flows NE., passing Cracow, and forming part of the boundary between Galicia and Russian Poland, traverses Poland and East Prussia (an important channel of trade in these countries), passing Warsaw (and the Praga suburb), Plock, Thorn, Culm, Graudenz, and Danzig, and enters the Baltic Sea by several mouths. The easternmost delta-arm, the Nogat, which formerly entered the Frisches Haff, has its mouth now closed. Of the two remaining main arms, the Elbing and the Danzig, the latter is the one chiefly used for navigation. Extensive engineering works have been required to regulate the discharge-channels. Total length of the river about 630 miles, the greater part of which (to the junction of the San, on the Galician frontier, or, for minor craft, to Cracow) is navigable. Width at Cracow, about 300 feet; at Mewe, above the Nogat bifurcation, at high water, about 1¼ miles. Principal affluents, on the right, the San, Wieprz, and Bug; on the left, the Pilica.

Vit'ebsk, a government of Russia, bordering on Courland and Livonia. Area, 17,440 sq. m. The surface is in part hilly and in part level. There are a number of lakes and extensive marshy tracts. The principal river is the Düna. There are large forests. The capital is Vitebsk. Pop. in 1897, 1,502,916. About two-thirds of the inhabitants are Russians, one-fifth Letts, and one-tenth Jews, the remainder being Poles.

Vitebsk, a town of Russia, capital of the government of Vitebsk, situated on both sides of the Düna. It was formerly a frontier town of Lithuania, Russian dominion dating from the first partition of Poland in 1772. The town presents but little of architectural interest outside of one or two of its churches. It is in part modernized and has an electric tramway. Tanning is an important industry and there is considerable trade. Pop. in 1897, 66,143, more than one-half of whom were Jews.

Viterbo, ve-tĕr'bo, a town of Italy, in the province of Rome, situated at the foot of Monte Cimino, 42 miles NNW. of Rome. It is surrounded by old Lombard walls and towers, and presents many interesting architectural features. On the Piazza del Plebiscito, in the heart of the town, stands the Palazzo Municipale, dating from the thirteenth century, with a handsome portico. It contains the municipal museum, with Etruscan, Roman, and mediæval antiquities. The venerable Romanesque cathedral of San Lorenzo and the Gothic church of San Francesco are among the most striking religious edifices. The Cappella Mazzatosta is decorated with fine frescoes by Lorenzo da Viterbo. The episcopal palace is an interesting thirteenth-century edifice, now in a state of decay. The Piazza Fontana Grande contains a large fountain of great antiquity. The attractive public gardens are embellished with numerous busts. In the vicinity of the town, to the N., are extensive Etruscan and Roman remains; 2 miles W. of it is a sulphur spring (Bulicame) with a popular bathing-establishment. Viterbo became a possession of the papal see as part of the "Patrimony of St. Peter," the legacy of Countess Matilda of Tuscany, who died in 1115. It figured prominently under the popes. Pop. (commune), in 1901, 21,292.

Viti-Levu, vee'tee lā'voo, an island, the largest of the Fiji group, SW. of Vanua-Levu. Area, 4250 sq. m. It is of volcanic origin and mountainous, rising in Mount Evans to nearly 4000 feet. The coasts are surrounded by coral reefs. It is very fertile and is the chief centre of the sugar-industry of the group. The climate is very hot and humid. On the S. coast is Suva, the chief settlement and the capital of the island group.

Vitim, ve-teem', a river of Siberia, rises in the mountains of Transbaikalia, SE. of Lake Baikal, flows NE. Volga, vol'gå, a river of Russia and the largest in Europe, rises near the village of Volgino-Verkhovye, on the Valdai plateau, government of Tver, at an elevation of about 680 feet above the sea, in lat. about 57° 15′ N. Its general course is circuitously eastward as far as Kazan (about lon. 49° E.), beyond which point it flows S., emptying into the Caspian Sea through a broad delta of numerous arms 30–40 miles below Astrakhan. The total length of the river is about 2200 miles, of which almost the entire course is navigable (to Rzhev). Steamboats ascend to Tver. The landscape of the Volga is that of dark and gloomy forests, open pastures, and meadowlands and steppes, with bluffs, rising 300–650 ft. high, bordering the right (W.) bank from Nizhni-Novgorod almost to the Caspian depression. The width of the stream is at ordinary stages of water about 420 ft. at Rzhev, 700 ft. at Tver, 1700–1850 ft. at Kostroma, and 2400 ft. at Nizhni-Novgorod. At Saratov, during spring overflows, the width varies from 1½ to nearly 3 miles, while at Astrakhan, beyond the first delta bifurcation, the main stream has a width of from ½ to 1½ miles. At Nizhni-Novgorod the overflows, as in the case of the lower Mississippi, extend over many miles. The chief affluents of the Volga are, on the right, the Oka, Sura, and Sarpa; and on the left, the Tvertsa, Mologa, Sheksna, Kostroma, Unsha, Vetluga, Kama, Maina, and Samara. The first delta-arm, the Akhtuba, is given off about 17 miles below Dubovka. The principal towns situated on the Volga are, in descending order, Tver, Rybinsk, Yaroslav, Kostroma, Nizhni-Novgorod, Kazan, Simbirsk, Samara, Saratov, Tsaritsyn, Sarepta, and Astrakhan. The Volga has a large fleet of passenger and freight steamboats, but its navigation is largely impeded by shallows, bars, and islands during periods of low water, and is closed by ice for many months during the winter. Various canals establish communication with the waters of the Black, Baltic, and White seas. The river abounds in fish, the sturgeon-fishery being especially important. Area of drainage-basin, about 560,000 sq. m.

Wales (Fr. Pays de Galles, pȧ'ee' dęh gȧll; L. Cambria), a division of Great Britain, with the title of principality, consisting of a large peninsula projecting westward from England, of which administratively it forms a part. It has on the E. the English counties of Chester, Shropshire, Hereford, and Monmouth, and on other sides Bristol and St. George's channels and the Irish Sea. Area, 7446 sq. m. Pop. in 1891, 1,519,000; in 1901, 1,720,600.

Wales is divided into 12 counties, as follows:

Counties.	Pop. in 1901.	Counties.	Pop. in 1901.
Anglesey	50,606	Flintshire	81,700
Brecknockshire	59,907	Glamorganshire*	859,931
Cardiganshire	60,240	Merionethshire	49,149
Carmarthenshire	135,328	Montgomeryshire	54,901
Carnarvonshire	126,883	Pembrokeshire	88,732
Denbighshire	129,942	Radnorshire	23,281

* Within the limits of the ancient county of Glamorgan are the county boroughs (civic counties) of Cardiff and Swansea.

The counties of Anglesey, Carnarvon, Denbigh, Flint, Merioneth, and Montgomery constitute what is known as North Wales, while South Wales consists of the counties of Brecknock, Cardigan, Carmarthen, Glamorgan, Pembroke, and Radnor. The largest cities are Cardiff, Swansea, and Merthyr-Tydfil. The NW. corner of the country is cut off from the main-land by a very narrow channel, Menai Strait, and constitutes the island of Anglesey. Barring this island, which has a generally flat or undulating surface, practically the whole of Wales is mountainous, with the ridges trending in the main in N.–S. and NE.–SW. directions. The bulk of these form what is now commonly designated the Cambrian Mountains. The region is constructed throughout of ancient rocks (Cambrian, Silurian, Devonian, and Carboniferous), traversed in numerous parts by volcanic intrusions, and has its rock-masses, through extreme metamorphic action, converted in greater part into slates and shales. The highest summit of the country is Snowdon, in Carnarvonshire, 3560 feet, which overtops the highest mountain of England. The volcanic Cader Idris, in Merionethshire, one of the most beautiful mountains of Great Britain, rises to 2925 ft. The loftiest points of South Wales are the Brecknock (or Brecon) Beacons, about 5 miles S. of the town of Brecon, where the Pen-y-Fan attains 2910 ft. The chief rivers are the Severn, Wye, Usk, Towy, Teify, Dovy, Conway, Clwyd, and Dee, the vales of some of which are very fertile. The lakes are insignificant. Numerous bays and inlets, some of them furnishing excellent harbors, indent the coast-line, as Carnarvon and Cardigan bays, on the W.; St. Bride's Bay and Milford Haven, on the SW.; Carmarthen and Swansea bays, separated by the peninsula of Gower, on the S.; and the estuary of the Dee and the harbor of Beaumaris, on the N. With its almost continuously rugged surface and its upper moorlands of moss and fern glowing in a wealth of heather blossoms, Wales presents a region of rare attraction to the tourist. Its generally mild climate—which in some parts permits of the out-door growth of subtropical plants—further attracts the traveller. The average annual rainfall is upward of 60 inches.

The natural resources of Wales lie in its great mineral wealth, comprising iron, copper, lead, zinc, and coal, together with vast deposits of excellent slate. The total mineral output in 1903 was valued at £13,017,498. The coal mined in that year, by far the greater part coming from the southern coal-fields (in Carmarthenshire and Glamorganshire, and extending W. into Pembrokeshire and E. into Monmouthshire, England), of which Cardiff is the great shipping port, was 35,666,895 tons. The more northerly coal-fields are those of the valley of the Severn (Coalbrookdale, Forest of Wyre, Forest of Dean) and of the region of the Dee estuary. The coal deposits of the S. lie in a vast synclinal of the Devonian formation. Glamorganshire is the chief seat of the mining- and metallurgical-industries. Here the iron-industry has assumed great proportions, and there are vast establishments at Swansea for the reduction of copper- and other ores brought from foreign countries, as well as for the manufacture of tin-plate. Cardiff ships more coal than any other port in the world. The agricultural resources of Wales are slender. In many parts cattle-rearing is more important than the cultivation of the soil. The principal ports are Cardiff, Swansea, and Holyhead.

Wales is divided into the four Anglican bishoprics of Llandaff, St. David's, Bangor, and St. Asaph. The majority of the people are dissenters from the Church of England. At the head of the educational institutions are the three "University Colleges" at Aberystwith, Bangor, and Cardiff. Lampeter is the seat of St. David's College. The bulk of the inhabitants of Wales are Welsh, a people belonging to the Cymric (Kymric) or Brythonic branch of the Celts. They call themselves Kymry. Nearly one-half of those who speak Welsh speak English also.

Wales was inhabited in ancient times by the Silures, Ordovices, and other Celtic tribes. The country was included in the Roman territorial division of Britannia Superior or Secunda. The Anglo-Saxon conquest of England drove great numbers of Britains into the fastnesses of Wales. These new-comers were merged in the body of their Celtic kin. In Anglo-Saxon and Norman times the country was divided into various principalities. These had to acknowledge the overlordship of the kings of England, but the Welsh continued to lead a practically independent existence until Edward I. undertook the conquest of the country, which he accomplished in 1277–83. Edward created his son (Edward II.) Prince of Wales, a title still conferred upon the heir to the British throne. At the close of the fourteenth century the Welsh rose in rebellion under Owen Glendower, but after a struggle of several years the authority of England was re-established. In 1536 Wales was incorporated with England.

Warsaw (Pol. Warszawa, vaR-shå'vå; Ger. Warschau, vaR'shŏw; Fr. Varsovie, vaR'so'vee'), a city of Russian Poland, capital of a government of its own name and of the general government of Warsaw (embracing Russian Poland), and formerly capital of the kingdom of Poland, on the left bank of the Vistula, 625 miles SSW. of St. Petersburg and 320 miles E. of Berlin. Lat. of observatory, 52° 13′ 5″ N.; lon. 21° 1′ 52″ E. The city is built for the most part on a hill, about 100 feet above the river, sloping towards the W. to an undulating plain. The suburb of Praga, on the right bank of the Vistula, is connected with the city by a fine iron bridge. Warsaw is defended by the Alexander citadel in the N. and by 15 detached forts. The old town, with its narrow and tortuous streets, bears in part a mediæval aspect. Beyond the gates, 11 in number, lie the suburbs, now included within the municipal jurisdiction.

Warsaw, which is still the active centre of Polish life, presents an animated appearance. On its most frequented square, the Castle Square, originally named after Sigismund III., stands the castle of the old Polish kings, now the residence of the governor-general. It was erected by the Masovian dukes, restored in the seventeenth century, and greatly embellished by John Sobieski and Stanislas Poniatowski. The Saxon Square is another fine public place. The handsomest and busiest thoroughfare is the Cracow Suburb, with many palaces and elegant shops. The Ujazdowska Avenue, containing numerous villas, is the fashionable promenade and leads to the open-air resorts of the populace. Jerusalem Street is another fine avenue. The city possesses a particular attraction in its beautiful gardens, such as that adjoining the Saxon Square (Saxon Garden), or those surrounding palaces like the Krasinski, the Belvedere château, and the Lazienki, an elegant castle in the Italian style, built in 1767–88. Other palaces are the Zamoyski, with valuable art collections; the former Brühl palace, which now serves as the telegraph office; and the Radziwill, used for administrative purposes. Other edifices worthy of note are the grand national theatre, the town-hall, and the buildings of the imperial bank and the finance administration.

The Roman Catholic cathedral of St. John, a Gothic structure, founded in the middle of the thirteenth century, contains many monuments to distinguished Poles, among them one by Thorwaldsen. The church of the Holy Virgin, dating from 1419, is the best preserved of the ancient ecclesiastical edifices, among which may also be mentioned the church of St. Anne, founded in 1454. The domed Lutheran church was finished in 1799; the Alexander church, erected by Alexander I., has recently been restored. The large Russian Alexander-Nevski cathedral has been in course of erection since 1894. The public monuments include an obelisk commemorating the Polish generals who fell in 1830 faithful to the Russian crown, and statues of Paskevitch, Copernicus, John Sobieski, Sigismund III., and the poet Mickiewicz. The university, founded in 1816 and suspended after the revolution of 1830–31, was reopened in 1869 as a Russian institution. It had 1400 students in 1902. Connected with it are a library, ethnographic museum, observatory, and botanical gardens. The city possesses a polytechnic institute, a conservatory of music, and a museum of fine arts.

Warsaw is, next to Lodz, the principal industrial centre of Poland. Its manufactures include metallic wares, machinery, food products, chemicals, matches, spirits, and tobacco. The shoe-industry, carried on in small establishments, is in the aggregate considerable. The climate of Warsaw is temperate. Mean annual temperature, 45°; mean temperature of January, 24°; of July, 66°. The city is the seat of an orthodox Russian and of a Roman Catholic archbishop. Pop. in 1882, 382,964; in 1897, 638,208, of whom about one-third were Jews. Pop. in 1905, estimated at about 750,000.

Warsaw rose into importance in the Middle Ages as the residence of the dukes of Masovia. Early in the seventeenth century it supplanted Cracow as the capital of Poland, Cracow remaining, however, the coronation-city. In July, 1656, the Poles were vanquished here in a three-days battle by the forces of Charles X. of Sweden and Frederick William, the "Great Elector" of Brandenburg. In 1702 Charles XII. of Sweden entered the city. In Nov., 1794, the Russians stormed Praga, where they committed frightful atrocities and forced Warsaw to capitulate. From 1795 to 1806 the city was in the possession of Prussia. From 1807 to 1813 it was the capital of the duchy of Warsaw, which was ruled by Frederick Augustus I., king of Saxony, as a vassal of Napoleon. It was occupied in 1813 by the Russians, under whom it became the capital of the new kingdom of Poland. In Nov., 1830, it rose against the Russians. In Sept., 1831, the forces of the czar re-entered the city.

Washington, or Uahuga, oo-ä-hoo'gą, one of the Marquesas Islands, South Pacific Ocean.

Washington, a parish of England, co. of Durham, 6 miles SSE. of Gateshead.

Washington, one of the Pacific states of the American Union, bounded N. by British Columbia (Dominion of Canada), E. by Idaho, S. by Oregon, and W. by the Pacific Ocean. Its N. boundary-line is the parallel of 49° N. lat. as far W. as the Gulf of Georgia, whence it follows the Canal de Haro and the Strait of Juan de Fuca to the open sea. On the E. the boundary is the meridian of 117° W. lon. as far S. as the Snake River, which stream is thence the boundary to the SE. angle of the state. Thence westward the boundary follows the parallel of 46° N. lat. to the Columbia River, which is the southern boundary from that point to the sea. Area of the land-surface, 66,880 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 2300 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—The Cascade Range, largely a dissected volcanic plateau of several thousand feet elevation, traverses the state from S. to N. and divides it into two very distinct sections. Western Washington, comprising two-fifths of the whole, is mainly a densely-timbered country receiving a heavy rainfall. It has a few very fertile prairies and some very rough and broken mountain-lands. Eastern Washington is but lightly timbered as a rule, has a comparatively dry climate, and is in great part a vast basaltic plateau (Columbia Plateau or Plains) of 1000–2000 feet elevation, built up of superimposed lava-sheets, and deeply trenched by traversing waters. In or in close association with the Cascade Range are the volcanic peaks of Mount Rainier or Tacoma (14,526 feet high), Mount Baker (10,827 ft.), Mount St. Helen's (9750 ft.), and Mount Adams (12,470 ft.). Some of these volcanoes, with perfect outlines and terminal craters, show signs of recent activity and are permanently snow-clad. Mount Rainier carries glaciers of the second magnitude (Cowlitz, Nisqually, Emmons, etc.). The Coast Range of the region to the south is represented in Washington by the Olympic Mountains (Mount Olympus 8150 ft.; Fitz Henry Peak, 8088 ft.; Mount Constance, 7777 ft.), between which and the Cascade Range is the deep lowland occupied in part by the ramifications of Puget Sound. A subordinate mountain-mass known as the Blue Mountains occupies the SE. part of the state.

Coast-Line, Rivers.—On the Pacific coast and the Strait of Juan de Fuca there are numerous excellent harbors; while the deep and tranquil waters of the noble Puget Sound, of Hood's Canal, of Admiralty Inlet, and of the lower Columbia River present unrivalled harbor facilities, and give to the state a commanding position in the commercial development of the Pacific coast. The Columbia River affords ship navigation nearly to the Cascades; and throughout the state this stream and its main affluents, the Snake and the Clark, afford steamboat navigation, with occasional interruption from rapids. The other principal rivers of eastern Washington are the Spokane, Okanogan, Yakima, and Palouse, direct or indirect affluents of the Columbia. Western Washington has many small rivers, among which are the Cowlitz, Chehalis (emptying into Gray's Harbor in the Pacific Ocean), Nisqually, and Snohomish. The larger Skagit River, in the NW. part of the state, discharges into Puget Sound. Lake Chelan, in the N. part of the state, has a length of about 40 miles.

Geology.—Nearly all that part of eastern Washington which lies S. of the upper Columbia and Spokane rivers is of a volcanic formation of comparatively recent geological age; but portions of the north and the Olympic Mountains are of ancient date, extending to the Azoic period. The immediate coast-region, with the Puget Sound country and the valley of the Cowlitz, is of Miocene Tertiary age and contains much lignite, while the San Juan Islands have in part been referred to the Cretaceous. The volcanic region of the E. forms part of the famous Columbia plateau, to which reference has already been made. The Blue Mountains are a part of the same formation. From this state considerable gold and some silver have been obtained; but the product at present is not very large. The principal mineral product is coal, which affords abundant fuel of good and coking quality. Most of the coal is mined in King, Pierce, and Kittitas cos. The product in 1903 was 3,193,273 short tons, valued at $5,380,679. The output of gold in 1903 was valued at $507,885.

Climate.—The climate of the state is very different in the eastern and western sections, that of the Pacific side of the Cascade Range being generally equable, with mild winters and temperate summers, while in the region E. of the mountains it is marked by extremes of temperature, ranging from about —30° in winter to 110° (or even higher) in summer. On the borders of Puget Sound, as at Seattle and Tacoma, the winter cold is not severe, and there is but little snow. The precipitation over most of the region W. of the Cascade Range is very heavy, rising in some places to 140 and 150 inches in a year, whereas in the region E. of it the rainfall is over large areas reduced to 15 and 10 inches, and irrigation is a requisite for agriculture.

Agriculture.—Eastern Washington is an admirable region for grazing, and some of its prairie-lands are excellent for agricultural purposes. Indian corn and the peach ripen here. The arable lands of the western section are of unsurpassed fertility. The enormous forest-growth has thus far interfered to some extent with agricultural progress. Wheat, barley, oats, and hay thrive here remarkably; and the state has become famous for its fruit, apples particularly. The cultivation of hops is an important industry in the state. The leading agricultural crops in 1900 were: wheat, 25,096,661 bushels; corn, 106,140 bushels; oats, 3,016,226 bushels; barley, 1,386,267 bushels; rye, 39,169 bushels; potatoes, 1,839,644 bushels; and hay, 846,491 tons. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 6,454,892 pounds.

Vegetation, Animals.—Washington has some of the grandest forests (Douglas pine, spruce, hemlock, cedar, etc.) in the United States, and supplies vast quantities of timber to different sections of the national domain, much of it for the making of spars and ship-trimmings. The redwood is found sparingly. The quantity of lumber cut in 1900 was 1,100,000,000 feet, valued at $11,000,000. The production of shingles was valued at $5,500,000. Among the animals may be mentioned various species of deer, bear, the mountain-goat, the pronghorn, Rocky Mountain sheep, puma, lynx, and many fur-bearing animals, as well as the prairie-dog, the sewellel, and other minor rodents. The rattlesnake and many harmless reptiles are found, and in some places the former is exceedingly abundant.

Fisheries.—Canned and salted salmon are important articles of export, salmon of several kinds being taken in great abundance. In the streams trout are very numerous. There seems to be an exhaustless supply of herring also, as well as of the oulachon (or candle-fish). Oysters are largely shipped from Shoalwater Bay. Among other products of the fisheries are the rock-fish, turbot, sole, and fishes called perch, cod, and bass, but not closely related to the fishes known by these names in Atlantic waters.

Industries.—The leading industries of the state include lumbering (products of all kinds, including sash and doors, etc., valued in 1900 at $31,543,649), milling (flour and grist-mill products, $6,875,672), fish-canning and preserving ($4,831,038), founding and machine-making ($2,257,643), dairying ($1,190,239), ship- and boat-building ($1,505,649).

Railroads.—In 1890 there were in the state 1999 miles of railroad in operation; in 1900, 2959 miles.

Education.—The University of Washington, the leading educational institution of the state, is located at Seattle. Other institutions are the Puget Sound University at Tacoma, the State Agricultural College and School of Science at Pullman, Gonzaga College at Spokane, and Whitman College at Walla Walla. There are several state normal schools.

Government, etc.—The governor and the principal executive officers hold office for 4 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of the former being elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. The state sends 3 representatives to the lower house of Congress.

Counties.—The counties were in 1900 36 in number, as follows: Adams, Asotin, Chehalis, Chelan, Clallam, Clarke, Columbia, Cowlitz, Douglas, Ferry, Franklin, Garfield, Island, Jefferson, King, Kitsap, Kittitas, Klikitat, Lewis, Lincoln, Mason, Okanogan, Pacific, Pierce, San Juan, Skagit, Skamania, Snohomish, Spokane, Stevens, Thurston, Wahkiakum, Wallawalla, Whatcom, Whitman, and Yakima.

Cities.—The chief cities are Seattle (pop. in 1900, 80,671), Tacoma (37,714), both important financial and business centres on Puget Sound; Spokane, in the E., with extensive water-power (36,848); Bellingham, Walla Walla, Everett, Ballard, and Olympia, the capital (4082).

Indians.—There were in the state in 1900 7526 tribal Indians, most of whom were attached to reservations.

Washington, a city, capital of the United States, in the District of Columbia (with which it is conterminous), and on the Potomac River, in lat. (Astrophysical Observatory of the Smithsonian Institution) 38° 53′ 17″ N., and lon. 77° 1′ 34″ W. from Greenwich. The city is on the Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington), the Baltimore and Ohio, the Southern and other railroads, 40 miles SW. of Baltimore, 136 miles SW. of Philadelphia, and 226 miles SW. of New York.

Washington is situated on the left bank of the Potomac River, at the head of tide and of navigation (130 miles from Chesapeake Bay), and was originally embraced between two tributaries, the East Branch (or Anacostia River) on the E. and Rock Creek on the W., the latter separating it from Georgetown. The plan of the city was made in anticipation of a great metropolis, and the comprehensive design of the architect, Major L'Enfant, made in 1791, is now in process of full execution, a magnificent scheme of public improvements having been recently inaugurated. The city was laid out with the Capitol Hill for a centre and with rectangularly-disposed streets having E.–W. and N.–S. directions, intersected by a number of diagonally-disposed and radiating avenues of great width. Many of the latter are bordered by beautiful mansions and traverse open "circles," in which have been erected monuments to the men distinguished in the nation's annals. The most famous of these avenues is Pennsylvania Avenue, 160 feet wide, the main arm of which connects the Capitol with the Treasury building. Other prominent avenues are Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. The principal business thoroughfare is F Street NW. The city is supplied with the greatest abundance of water, which is brought from the Great Falls of the Potomac, some 15 miles distant, by a conduit which passes over the famous Cabin John Bridge.

Foremost in architectural merit and in point of interest among the public buildings of Washington is the Capitol, situated on an eminence (sloping abruptly toward the W.) 90 feet above the Potomac. It consists of what is known as the Centre Capitol and of two extensions or wings. The principal front, facing towards the E., presents three splendid Grecian porticoes. The centre building, which is of freestone, was commenced in 1793, when the corner-stone was laid by Washington. The extension, of pure white marble, was commenced in 1851, under President Fillmore. The whole building is 751 ft. long and covers an area of 3½ acres. A rotunda, 96 ft. in diameter, in the centre of the building, is surmounted by a huge dome of iron, upon the top of which is Crawford's bronze statue of Liberty, the head of which is 287 ft. above the basement of the Capitol. This rotunda is filled with historical paintings, such as the Declaration of Independence, the Surrender of Burgoyne, the Surrender of Cornwallis, and Washington Resigning his Commission at Annapolis, all by Trumbull; the Embarkation of the Pilgrims from Leyden, by Weir; the Landing of Columbus, by Vanderlyn; the Baptism of Pocahontas, by Chapman; and the Discovery of the Mississippi, by Powell. Other apartments of note in the Capitol are the Senate chamber in the N. extension; the hall of the House of Representatives, in the S. extension; the old Senate chamber, now the Supreme Court room, in the central building; and the old hall of the House of Representatives, now devoted to collections of historical statues. The total cost of the building, with its various modifications, has amounted to about $16,000,000. East of the Capitol is the new Congressional Library, a vast and sumptuous structure in the Italian Renaissance style, erected in 1888–97 at a cost of $6,180,000. It measures 470 ft. in length and 340 ft. in width, and contains at the present time over 800,000 books and 250,000 pamphlets. One and a half miles NW. of the Capitol is the President's house, or Executive Mansion, commonly known as the White House, built of freestone and surrounded by extensive grounds. Near this, on the E., is the Treasury building, an immense edifice in the Grecian style, 510 ft. long by 280 ft. wide. Other edifices of note are the fine building W. of the White House, in which are accommodated the State Department, the War Department, and the Navy Department, measuring 567 ft. in length and 342 ft. in breadth; the Land Office (formerly the General Post Office), of white marble; the Patent Office, with a great Doric portico; the building of the Smithsonian Institution, devoted to scientific research and the promotion of useful knowledge, a structure 450 ft. long by 140 ft. wide, built of red sandstone, in the Norman style; the building of the Department of Agriculture; and the United States National Museum, situated in the Smithsonian Park. In the last-named is housed an enormous collection of economic products, objects of national history, and the products of art and manufactures. Other institutions are the Army Medical Museum, with valuable pathological collections, the botanical garden, and the zoological gardens, located in the Rock Creek tract. The city is the seat of the national surveys (geologic, geographic, hydrographic, coast and geodetic, ethnologic, etc.), of various general scientific associations (National Geographic Society, Washington Academy of Sciences, Biological Society, Anthropological Society, etc.), the Carnegie Institute, the National Academy of Sciences, and the International Bureau of the American Republics.

Washington is the seat of the United States Naval Observatory, the Signal Office, the Weather Bureau, Government Asylum for the Insane of the army and navy and the District of Columbia, and Soldiers' Home for the disabled soldiers of the regular army. Here also are many noteworthy institutions of learning, including George Washington (formerly Columbian) University (Baptist), Georgetown University (Roman Catholic), Howard University (nonsectarian and open to both sexes, regardless of color), the National Deaf-Mute College, and the Catholic University of America. Among the remaining institutions is the Corcoran Art Gallery, founded and endowed by W. W. Corcoran, and containing a notable collection of paintings and statuary. Of the numerous monuments of the city the most famous and imposing is the Washington Monument, a giant obelisk of marble, which rises to a height of 555 feet. It was begun in 1848 and completed in 1884, at a total cost of $1,300,000. About 1½ miles SE. of the Capitol is the United States Navy-Yard. Washington is connected with the opposite bank of the Potomac by Long Bridge. On the Virginia shore, overlooking the city, is Arlington, with the beautiful National Cemetery. About 15 miles below the city is Mount Vernon, the home of Washington.

The resident population of Washington proper in 1870 was 109,199; in 1880, 147,293; in 1890, 188,932; in 1900, 218,196. Washington proper and Georgetown had in 1900 232,745 inhabitants. The population of the District of Columbia in that year was 278,718. A police census of the District of Columbia taken in 1905 returned a population of 323,346, of whom 95,534 were colored. Among the buildings now (1905) in course of erection are the new office-buildings of the Senate and House of Representatives, the new city-hall, and the vast Union railway station, a marble pile estimated to cost $15,000,000.

The site for the national capital was chosen at the original suggestion of President Washington, but not without opposition. The act making the selection was passed in July, 1790, and in 1800 the seat of government was removed thither from Philadelphia. In 1814 the city was entered by the British, who set fire to the Capitol, President's House, and other public buildings. In July, 1864, the city was threatened by a Confederate force under Early. The treaty of Washington for the settlement of the "Alabama" question was concluded in 1871. See DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Weimar, ŵī'mar, the capital of the grand-duchy of Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, Germany, pleasantly situated on the left bank of the Ilm, 13 miles E. of Erfurt. Weimar derives its chief interest from its association with the classical period of German literature. Goethe's house, which he occupied for 40 years, now the Goethe National Museum, contains precious relics of the great poet. Schiller's house is also open to the public. Rietschel's Goethe-

Schiller monument in bronze stands in front of the theatre. On the Herder-Platz rises the Peter-Pauls- (or Stadt-) Kirche, built in the fifteenth century, with a superb altar-piece by the elder Cranach. Herder is buried in the church, and his monument is in front of it. The grand-ducal palace, with interesting frescoes, occupies the site of the edifice erected partly under Goethe's supervision. Near it stands the building containing the Goethe and Schiller archives. Opposite the modern Gothic town-hall is the house occupied by the painters Cranach. The Wieland monument and Goethe's Garden house in the attractive park on the banks of the Ilm are other reminders of the time of Weimar's literary splendor. On an elevation W. of the park is the Belvedere, a château with pleasure-grounds, commanding a fine view. The cemetery contains the grand-ducal vault, in which rest Schiller and Goethe.

Western Australia (originally SWAN RIVER SETTLEMENT), a British crown-colony and one of the states of the Commonwealth of Australia, comprising all of the Australian continent lying W. of lon. 129° E., and having, with the associated coast islands, its most westerly point in Dirk Hartog Island, lon. 112° 52′ E. The entire eastern boundary is formed by South Australia (proper) and the Northern Territory of South Australia. Area, 975,920 sq. m. Population in 1901, 184,124. The region lies broadly between lat. 13° 25′ and 35° 5′ S., and thus covers nearly 22 degrees of latitude. The coast-line has a number of deep indentations,—Freycinet Harbor, Sharks Bay, Exmouth Gulf, King Sound, Brunswick Bay, Admiralty Gulf, Cambridge Gulf, on the W., NW., and N.,—but there are few serviceable natural harbors, and navigation is much hampered in places by the great rise of the tidal waters (in Cambridge Gulf, 20 feet; King Sound, 45 ft.). Large harbor-works are being constructed at some of the ports.

The interior and greater part of Western Australia is a plateau of moderate altitude, 700–1000 feet in general elevation, and rising in places to perhaps twice this height. It forms part or is a continuation of what has been termed the great Austral Plain, which gives evidence of having been at a comparatively recent geological period a sea-bed, and of marking an oceanic separation between the eastern and western sections of what is to-day the Australian continent. Almost the whole of this interior region is desert or sand-covered plain, with little or no vegetation over large areas, or with dense scrubs of acacia, crowded into more favored spots, and the characteristic porcupine-grass or spinifex. There are no permanent water-courses, and the numerous so-called lakes are mostly dry during the greater part of the year, being turned into water-basins only with the coming of the rains. This infertile region, which constitutes the greater part of the Eastern Division of the colony, has the Great Victoria Desert in the S., the Gibson Desert in the centre, and the Great Sandy Desert in the N.

A region of lofty highlands or mountains borders the western coast-line, or lies off from it at a distance of 50–100 miles, and other mountains appear behind these, and still others occupy the major part of the Northern or Kimberley Division. The relations of these different mountains to one another have not yet been definitely ascertained, nor are their relations to the structure of the continent fully understood. Among the better-known of the individual ranges are the Darling, Herschel, and Victoria ranges in the SW., presenting no summit much exceeding 1500 feet in height; the Stirling Range, inland from Albany (3500 ft.?); Lockyer and Capricorn ranges in the central west; and the King Leopold, Müller, and McClintock ranges in the N. (Kimberley Division)—2000–2500 (?) ft. Individual summits are mounts Augustus (3580 ft.?) and Labouchere (3400 ft.?), both in the official Western Division.

The water-courses of the W. part of Western Australia are numerous and comprise among the better-known (beginning at the SW. and proceeding northward) the Swan River (at the mouth of which is Fremantle), the Murchison, Gascoyne, Ashburton, Fortescue, De Grey, Fitzroy, and Ord rivers. The Swan alone is important, the others for the most part lacking water in the dry months. The climate is hot in the northern parts and in the interior, but not unhealthy, and in the far south a generally agreeable temperature prevails. December, January, and February are the hottest months, and June and July, when a mild winter prevails, the coolest. A temperature below 20° has been noted in the far interior. The annual rainfall ranges from about 38 inches in the extreme SW. (Perth, 33 inches; Kimberley, 20 inches; Coolgardie district, 10 inches) to practically nothing in the interior.

The more productive regions of the colony are in the SW. and W., where there are large areas of noble forest (of eucalyptus or blue-gum, sandal-wood, jarrah, karri, etc.), yielding good and serviceable timber, and lands well adapted to grazing purposes and to agricultural pursuits. The ordinary crops of the north temperate zone (wheat, barley, oats, maize, potatoes, hay, etc.) do well, and there is considerable cultivation of the apple, peach, orange, lemon, grape, and other fruits. The total area of the state under cultivation in 1904 was 283,752 acres, of which 137,946 was under wheat (yielding 1,876,252 bushels). The live-stock in 1903 included 2,599,633 sheep, 497,617 cattle, 82,747 horses, besides numbers of pigs and goats, and 2031 camels. The wool-clip of that year amounted to 12,501,804 pounds, valued at £443,743. The chief resources of the state are in its wool, timber, and mineral wealth, the last-named represented by deposits spread over a vast extent of territory, stretching almost continuously from the Kimberley region in the N. to Dundas in the S., and eastward from near the W. coast to the meridian of 125° and 130° E. longitude. The more productive gold-fields are those of Kimberley and Pilbarra in the N. and NW.; Ashburton, Peak Hill, and Murchison in the W.; and Coolgardie and Dundas in the S. Gold was first discovered in this region in 1886. Up to and inclusive of the year 1903 (when the production was 2,064,801 fine ounces), the gold output was 10,933,141 fine ounces, valued at £46,441,033. In June, 1904, there were in the state 2161 miles of railway in operation.

The settlement of Western Australia was begun in 1829. On Jan. 1, 1901, the colony became a state of the Commonwealth of Australia.

West Indies, or Antilles, an extensive system of islands in the Atlantic Ocean, forming the northern and eastern boundary of the Caribbean Sea, and stretching in crescentic form from near the NE. extremity of Yucatan and southeastern Florida to the Gulf of Paria, in Venezuela, and westward from this point along the N. coast of the South American continent to the Gulf of Venezuela. The Bahama Islands, although sometimes excluded, are properly members of the West Indies, but will not be considered here. (See BAHAMAS.) The islands (without the Bahamas) lie broadly between the parallels of 10° and 23° 30′ N. lat. and the meridians of 59° and 85° W. lon. They comprise a number of groups to which distinctive names (mostly without a physiographic reference) have been given: 1, the Greater Antilles (comprising Cuba, Haiti, Jamaica and Porto Rico, and some minor associated islands); 2, the Lesser Antilles (sometimes designated Caribbean Islands), the line of islands extending southward from (and including) the Virgin Islands (immediately E. of Porto Rico) to Trinidad, and divided into a northern or Leeward and a southern or Windward section; and 3, the Venezuelan Leeward Islands (Margarita, Buen Ayre, Curaçao, etc.). (For a more extended notice of these different groups, see ANTILLES, CARIBBEES, LEEWARD ISLANDS, WINDWARD ISLANDS, and VIRGIN ISLANDS; also the special notices of CUBA, HAITI, JAMAICA, etc.) The West Indian islands are, in the opinion of many geologists, the disrupted parts of a former continuous land-mass, or specifically the remains of a section of the northern Andes, whose continental continuation is to be found in the northern border mountains of Venezuela, and whose eastern termination is the peninsula of Paria. The islands of the Greater Antilles are fundamentally of sedimentary construction, with ancient granitic and volcanic cores and intruded sheets, and plunge in some parts with extraordinary steepness into the sea (Sierra Maestra, in the S. of Cuba; the N. coast of Porto Rico; Haiti). The mountain-slopes carried to the suboceanic bases where they are implanted can properly be said to measure 20,000–25,000 feet. Mount Tina (or Loma Tina), NW. of the city of Santo Domingo, about 10,300 ft. in height, is the loftiest elevation of the entire West Indies. The Lesser Antilles (or eastern West Indies) are arranged in double series,—an outer (or eastern) and an inner (or western), the latter being almost wholly volcanic (Montserrat, St. Christopher, Nevis, Guadeloupe, Dominica, Martinique, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Grenada, and some others), with individual summits rising to 3500–4500 (5000?) ft., and nearly all giving evidences of recent activity. (See PELÉE, MONT, and SOUFRIÈRE.) There is reason to believe that the Greater Antilles were united, and at a no very distant geological period, with Central America on the lines of shallows that are indicated by the Great and Little Cayman and Misteriosa banks, SW. of Cuba, and the great Jamaica-Honduras bank or plateau. Two of the major breaks in the continuity of the West Indian islands form to-day the Windward Passage between Cuba and Haiti, and the Mona Passage between Haiti (Santo Domingo) and Porto Rico. Evidences of comparatively recent uplift are to be found in nearly all the islands in their terraces or raised beaches. The climate of the whole is tropical, but modified by the surrounding ocean and the elevated surface of many of the islands. The eastern side of the Lesser Antilles is tempered by the continuous trade-winds. The products are sugar, tobacco, cacao, coffee, logwood, pimento, ginger, arrowroot, tropical fruits of many kinds, sponges, etc. Some of the minor islands have yielded much guano. Columbus landed on Guanahani (probably Watling's Island), in the Bahama group, in Oct., 1492; and the archipelago, under the erroneous impression, at the time of the discovery, that it formed part of Asia, was called the West Indies.

Westphalia, wĕst-fā'le-ą (Ger. Westphalen, wĕst-fā'-lĕn), a province of Prussia, bordering on the Netherlands. It lies NE. of the Rhine Province and S. of Hanover. Area, 7803 sq. m. The surface is mostly mountainous and hilly, with an extensive level tract in the NW. reaching to the Netherlands. The greatest elevation, near the SE. border, is about 2700 feet above the sea. The low range of mountains called the Teutoburger Wald extends along the NE. border. About one-half of the surface is drained by the Rhine through its affluents, the Lippe and Ruhr, the latter of which receives the Lenne. The easternmost part is watered by the Weser, and the Ems has its upper course in the northern part. Somewhat more than one-fourth of the area of the province is covered with forests. The soil presents every variation of fertility and unproductiveness.

The land-holdings are mainly small, the peasant-proprietor class being very large. The chief cereals in the order of their acreage and product are rye, oats, and wheat. Potatoes are extensively cultivated and the province is noted for its flax. Large numbers of cattle and swine are reared. The hams of Westphalia are celebrated. Westphalia is noted for its mineral wealth. It has some of the richest coal-fields in the world, the annual product exceeding 40,000,000 tons. It is also a great iron-district and yields much zinc and copper. Vast quantities of sulphuric acid are produced from the pyrite mined in the province. Westphalia is one of the most important manufacturing districts of the European continent. It is a great seat of the linen-industry, and other textiles are also extensively manufactured. The iron-industry is on a vast scale.

The population in 1900 was 3,187,777, about equally divided between Catholics and Protestants. The Jews number a little more than 20,000. The capital is Münster, which is the seat of a university. The province is divided into the three government-districts of Münster, Minden, and Arnsberg.

In the early part of the Middle Ages the western third of the land of the Saxons (the original Saxony, which extended from the lower Elbe southwestward almost to the Rhine) appears under the name of Westphalia. The eastern third was called Eastphalia, and the middle section Engern. Later the name Westphalia came to designate a duchy ruled by the electors (archbishops) of Cologne. It was a district in the SE. part of the present province of Westphalia. Here the electors ruled down to 1803. Parts of Westphalia passed into the possession of Brandenburg (the nucleus of the Prussian kingdom) in the seventeenth century. By the acts of the Congress of Vienna (1814–15), all of Westphalia became Prussian. One of the circles of the Holy Roman (German) Empire was called the Westphalian Circle. The general treaty of peace terminating the Thirty Years' War, negotiated at Osnabrück and Münster (both in the circle of Westphalia), and signed at Münster on Oct. 24 (new style), 1648, is known as the Peace of Westphalia.

West Point (officially, Westpoint), a post-village of Orange co., N.Y., on the right or W. bank of the Hudson River, where that stream passes through the Highlands in a narrow and tortuous pass, about 50 miles N. of the city of New York, on the West Shore R. Lat. of observatory, 41° 23′ 22″ N.; lon. 73° 57′ 39″ W. It is the site of the United States Military Academy, which was established here (pursuant to a recommendation made years before by Washington) in 1802. The natural strength of the place led to its selection for a fortress during the Revolutionary War, and the ruins of Fort Putnam, which was constructed at that period, crown a hill (a little to the SW. of the extreme point) of 598 feet elevation above the river. The principal buildings of the academy—which comprise officers' quarters, cadet barracks, academic buildings, library, superintendent's office, mess- and riding-halls, hospital, Cullum Memorial Hall (containing military trophies, paintings, etc.)—and the beautiful parade-ground occupy a plateau elevated about 180 ft. above the river and cover in their distribution an area of some 200 acres. Fort Clinton and the other works that constituted the fortress at the period of the Revolutionary War occupied the same plateau, and were defended by redoubts on the summits of the hills, of which Fort Putnam was the chief. The fortifications were laid out by the Polish patriot Kosciuszko. Benedict Arnold was placed in command of this fortress in 1780, and he immediately proceeded to carry out a plot to surrender it into the hands of the British. His treason came to naught through the capture of Major André. During the Revolutionary War a chain was stretched across the river at this point to prevent the passage of the enemy's ships. The site of West Point commands probably one of the finest river-views in the world.

West Virginia, an east-central state of the American Union, lying in the Appalachian region and bounded on the N. and NE. by Pennsylvania and Maryland, on the SE. and S. by Virginia, and on the W. by Ohio (from which it is separated by the Ohio River) and Kentucky (separated by the Big Sandy River). Area, 24,780 sq. m. It is of irregular outline, and sends out to the northward a narrow projection between Ohio and Pennsylvania, known as the Panhandle. The Potomac River forms the major part of the boundary with Maryland, while main ridges of the Alleghany Mountains define the border with Virginia.

Face of the Country.—Much of the surface is mountainous, being traversed in the E. and centre by parallel ridges of the Alleghany Mountains, direct continuations of the mountains of Maryland and Pennsylvania with the usual NE.–SW. trend of the Appalachian system. The Great North (or Shenandoah) Mountain, the correspondent of the more northerly Blue (or Kittatinny) Mountains, bounds the Shenandoah Valley on the W., and is succeeded westward by one of the main axes of the Alleghany system of the state. Other more or less parallel and subordinate ridges are known under the names of Cheat, Laurel, Greenbrier, Cowpasture, Flat Top, Rich, Briery, Gauley, Birch, Sewell, and Meadow mountains. These ridges are generally fertile to the top, with wooded sides, and often there are splendid natural meadows or "glades" upon their summits. The mountains generally present most picturesque and occasionally imposing scenery. They maintain a general crest-line of 2500–3500 feet elevation, with numerous summits rising to 3800–4000 ft., and a few considerably surpassing this altitude. The culminating point of the state is Spruce Knob, 4860 ft. Other summits are High Knob, 4710 ft.; Big Spruce Knob, 4652 ft.; Cunningham Knob, 4485 ft.; Grassy Knob, 4391 ft.; Blue Knob, 4368 ft.; Buck Knob, 4356 ft.; and Locust Knob, 4392 ft. Westward of the main mountains follows the up-land of the Alleghany Plateau, a largely dissected region of 1000 to 2500 ft. general elevation, which falls off westward to the Ohio River, where the low level of 550–650 ft. is reached.

Rivers.—Almost the entire state belongs to the basin of the Ohio River, among whose tributaries are the Big Sandy, Guyandotte, Great and Little Kanawha, and Monongahela, streams that are navigable to a greater or less extent, most of them having been artificially improved. Minor rivers are the Tygart's Valley, Greenbrier, New, Elk, Cheat, Gauley, and Cacapon. The Shenandoah River flows through a small section of the state in the NE. and the Potomac rises by several forks in the N.

Geology.—More than two-thirds of the area of the state is overlaid by the coal-measures; and although the remaining third (comprising the counties bordering on Virginia) is mainly of the Silurian and Devonian ages, yet even here there are detached beds of the Carboniferous, containing some of the most valuable coals in the state. The principal coals of the state are bituminous and are found in most of the counties westward of the easterly front of the main Alleghany, Greenbrier, and Great Flat Top mountains. The coals are all excellent and are highly valued for coking. The West Virginia coal-field covers 16,000 sq. m. and coal-mining is carried on in more than 20 counties. Nearly all the coal mined is from the four mining districts known as: the New and Kanawha River, the Elk Garden (or Upper Potomac), the Pocahontas (or Flat Top), and the Fairmont (or Upper Monongahela). In 1903 the quantity of coal mined was 29,337,241 short tons, valued at $34,297,019. West Virginia is one of the largest producers of petroleum, which is obtained from the districts known as those of "West Virginia," "Volcano," and "Petroleum." The greater part of the product is piped to Philadelphia and Baltimore. The yield in 1903 was 12,899,395 barrels, valued at $20,516,532. The supply of natural gas is very large, and was in 1903 (valued at $6,882,359) second only to that of Pennsylvania. Among the other mineral resources of the state are salt, obtained in large quantities (245,000 barrels in 1903) from natural brines, limonitic iron-ores, glass-sand, kaolin, and, in minor quantity or but little exploited, the ores of copper, lead, and zinc. Numerous thermal and medicinal springs are scattered about in the mountain-regions and are largely visited for their curative qualities or as centres of pleasure-resorts.

Forests.—A large part of West Virginia is still densely covered with forests of oak, hemlock, spruce, ash, tulip, walnut, poplar, cherry, locust, chestnut, and other timber trees. In 1900 it was estimated that the wooded area still comprised upward of 18,000 sq. m. The lumber and timber products are among the most valuable assets of the state.

Agriculture.—The valleys, the hillsides, and ridges are generally fertile, and the mountain-glades afford excellent pasturage. The southeastern valleys abound in rich blue-grass, and the Panhandle is an extremely fertile agricultural tract. West Virginia produces nearly every crop of the northern and middle sections of the country. The chief agricultural crops in 1900 were: corn, 19,299,708 bushels; wheat, 4,452,895 bushels; oats, 2,768,451 bushels; rye, 127,796 bushels; buckwheat, 223,958 bushels; potatoes, 3,029,120 bushels; and hay, 547,600 tons. The cultivation of orchard fruits is now prosecuted on a large scale.

Manufactures.—The most important industry is the manufacture of iron and steel, confined to Wheeling and its immediate vicinity, the product of which was valued in 1900 at $16,514,212. The second largest industry is that of lumber and the manufacture of lumber and timber products, the value of which (including sash, doors, and blinds) was $12,433,300. The state ranks second in the output of coke ($3,529,241), and has also extensive manufactures of glass ($1,871,795), leather ($3,210,753), brick, tile, and pottery.

Transportation, etc.—The Ohio River with its tributaries affords an excellent outlet for the products of the state, and the facilities for transportation afforded by it laid the foundation of the prosperity of the state when its railroads had but a short mileage. In 1850 there were 97 miles of railroad in what is now this state; in 1860, 352 miles; in 1865, 365 miles; in 1870, 387 miles; in 1875, 615 miles; in 1880, 694 miles; in 1885, 1038 miles; in 1890, 1433 miles; in 1902, about 3500 miles.

Counties.—The state is divided into 55 counties, as follows: Barbour, Berkeley, Boone, Braxton, Brooke, Cabell, Calhoun, Clay, Doddridge, Fayette, Gilmer, Grant, Greenbrier, Hampshire, Hancock, Hardy, Harrison, Jackson, Jefferson, Kanawha, Lewis, Lincoln, Logan, McDowell, Marion, Marshall, Mason, Mercer, Mineral, Mingo, Monongalia, Monroe, Morgan, Nicholas, Ohio, Pendleton, Pleasants, Pocahontas, Preston, Putnam, Raleigh, Randolph, Ritchie, Roane, Summers, Taylor, Tucker, Tyler, Upshur, Wayne, Webster, Wetzel, Wirt, Wood, and Wyoming.

Cities.—The principal cities are Wheeling (pop. in 1900, 38,878), Huntington (11,923), Parkersburg (11,703), Charleston (the capital, 11,099), Martinsburg (7564), Fairmont (5655), Grafton (5650), Moundsville (5362), Bluefield, and Benwood. Other noted places are Harpers Ferry and Morgantown.

Education.—The leading educational institutions of the state are the University of West Virginia, at Morgantown, which in 1904 had an attendance of 690; Bethany College, at Bethany; and the Morris Harvey College, at Barboursville. There are state or other normal schools at Huntington (Marshall College), Fairmont, Glenville, Shepherdstown, West Liberty, and Athens. The West Virginia Colored Institute is at Institute.

Government, etc.—The governor and principal executive officers are elected for a term of 4 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of delegates, the members of the former being elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. West Virginia sends 5 members to the lower house of the national Congress.

The population of what is now West Virginia, in 1860, was 376,688, of whom 18,371 were slaves; in 1870, 442,014; in 1880, 618,457; in 1890, 762,794; in 1900, 958,800. In 1900 there were 22,451 foreign-born inhabitants. The negroes numbered 43,499.

History.—On the passage of the ordinance of secession by Virginia in 1861, the people of the western section of the state, in which slavery never had a strong foothold, at once took measures for the organization of a new state government. There was a long-standing political jealousy towards the people of the remainder of Virginia, and a large majority of the inhabitants were friends of the national cause. In 1861 a constitution was framed, in 1862 it was accepted by the people and by Congress, and in 1863 West Virginia began her existence as a state of the Union.

Wheeling, a city and port of entry, the capital of Ohio co., W.Va., is finely situated on the E. bank of the Ohio River, at the mouth of Wheeling Creek, 63 miles SW. of Pittsburg, Pa., on the Baltimore and Ohio, the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis and the Wheeling and Lake Erie Rs. The site of the city is a narrow alluvial plain, which is overlooked by precipitous hills, and occupies an elevation of about 640 feet above sea-level. Wheeling is the most populous town of West Virginia, and is the largest and most important place on the Ohio River between Pittsburg and Cincinnati. It has a fine court-house, city-hall, and some other public buildings, the Krugar Monument, Linsley Institute, Wheeling Female Academy, etc. The old National Road crosses the river at Zane's Island, opposite Wheeling, by a beautiful wire suspension-bridge, which has a span of 1010 feet. Fine railroad bridges also span the river at or near this point, connecting with Bridgeport, Martins Ferry, and Bellaire, Ohio. The surrounding region has extensive coal-beds. Wheeling is the iron- and steel-manufacturing centre of the state, and has large blast-furnaces, wire-works, foundries and forges, bridge-works, etc., and manufactures of nails and shovels, glassware, pottery, tobacco, cigars, flour, leather, canned goods, malted liquors, etc. Wheeling was the seat of the state government from 1863 to 1870 and from 1875 to 1885. White Mountains, a division or stem of the Appalachian system of the eastern United States, in Coos, Grafton, and Carroll cos., N.H., noted for their bold and picturesque scenery, and constituting one of the most favored health and pleasure regions of the national domain. In their dominant masses (or as ordinarily understood) they cover an area of 1200–1300 sq. m., extending from the Connecticut River on the W. to the Maine boundary on the E., and from about lat. 43° 45′ N. on the S. to the Upper Ammonoosuc and Androscoggin rivers (lat. 44° 30′) on the N. The general trend of the system is NE.–SW., conformable broadly to the trend of the main ridges of the Appalachian Mountains, but extensive denudation has worn deep gorges into the backbones and in part so far eroded the region as to mask the continuity and the relationships of some sections. The major part of the system rises from a plateau of 1500–1600 feet elevation, and the most elevated section attains a crest-line of 5000–6000 ft. There are few summits that can properly be called peaks, and there are no strictly Alpine features connected with the mountains. Most of the loftier summits are in what is known as the Presidential Range, or the White Mountains proper, which extends from the Saco River on the S. northeastward to the Moose River, near Randolph, or over a length of 14 miles. The culminating point of this section, and of the entire system, is Mount Washington, 6293 ft.,—the loftiest summit of the United States E. of the Rocky Mountains and N. of North Carolina or Tennessee. (See WASHINGTON, MOUNT.) Other summits of this range (beginning in the N.) are mounts Madison (5380 ft.), Adams (5805 ft.), Jefferson (5725 ft.), Clay (5534 ft.), Monroe (5390 ft.), Franklin (5028 ft.), Pleasant (4780 ft.), Clinton (4275 ft.), Jackson (4012 ft.), and Webster (3876 ft.). A somewhat subordinate section of the broader White Mountains, but one not lacking in the more rugged types of scenery that distinguish some portions of the Presidential Range (Tuckerman's Ravine, on the E. slope of Mount Washington; the Glen, E. of Mount Clay), are the Franconia Mountains, which continue in echelon fashion the main White Mountains southwestward, and lie between the East Branch of the Pemigewasset River on the SE. and different branches of the Lower Ammonoosuc River on the NW. The culminating point of this section is Mount Lafayette (5270 ft.); other summits are mounts Lincoln (5098 ft.), Garfield (or Haystack, 4520 ft.), North and South Twin Mountains, Cannon (Profile Mountain), Liberty, Kinsman, Flume, etc. (See FRANCONIA MOUNTAINS.) Less prominent summits of the White Mountains than those already mentioned, lying off the main ridges, are Starr King (3915 ft.) and Waumbek (4020 ft.), near the village of Jefferson; Cherry Mountain, 7 miles S. of Jefferson (3600 ft.); Mount Randolph, 7 miles W. of Gorham (3280 ft.); Carter Dome, 7 miles E. of Mount Washington (4860 ft.). Among the noted places of scenic or general interest besides those already mentioned are the White Mountain, or Crawford Notch, bounding the Presidential Range on the SW.; King's Ravine, on the N. slope of Mount Adams; the Franconia Notch, S. of Mount Lafayette; the Flume (also in the Franconia Mountains); and the Upper and Lower Ammonoosuc Falls. The summit of Mount Washington, reached by mountain railroad, commands one of the finest prospects in the eastern United States. The White Mountains are throughout the greater part of their extent lacking in lakes, which pre-eminently distinguishes them from the Adirondacks. They were until a comparatively recent period densely covered with forest, of which considerable areas still remain. Geologically they represent some of the oldest patches of land on the continent, being formed of Archæan (Montalban, Huronian) strata. During the Glacial Period nearly all the summits were buried beneath ice, and there are still extensive deposits of drift remaining. Among the more frequented resort towns and villages are: Franconia, Sugar Hill, Littleton, Bethlehem, Whitefield, Jefferson, Lancaster, Gorham, Jackson, North Conway, and Intervale. The most important industrial town in the region is Berlin.

Wisconsin, originally, in the French form, Ouisconsin, the most important river of the interior of Wisconsin, rises on the Michigan boundary in Lake Desert (or Vieux Desert), flows generally S. to Portage City and thence WSW. to the Mississippi River, which it enters about 4 miles S. of Prairie du Chien. It is nearly 600 miles long and is navigated by steamboats to Portage City (a distance of some 200 miles), where a short canal unites the Wisconsin with the Fox River. Rapids and falls occur at several places on the Wisconsin River, which passes through deep gorges between rocky bluffs and traverses (in the N.) vast forests of evergreens. The Dalles of the Wisconsin are near Kilbourn City.

Wisconsin, a north-central state of the American Union, bounded on the N. and NE. by Lake Superior and the upper peninsula of Michigan, on the E. by Lake Michigan, on the S. by Illinois, and on the W. by Iowa and Minnesota. Its southern boundary is the parallel of 42° 30′ N. lat.; the northern limit, including the Apostle Islands, is in lat. 47° 3′ N. The rivers Montreal and Menominee separate it in part from the northern peninsula of Michigan, and its western boundary is for the most part washed by the St. Croix and Mississippi rivers. There are in lakes Superior and Michigan some important islands belonging to Wisconsin. Area of the land-surface, 54,450 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 1590 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—Wisconsin is an elevated, rolling country of woodland and prairie, in general from 600 to 1000 feet in elevation, and with few points rising above 1500 ft. The Penokee Range, which has structural relations with the Mineral and Gogebic ranges of Michigan, presents, with its continuations in the NW. and N., probably the loftiest elevations in the state (about 1700 ft.). Minor elevations are found in the Menominee Range in the NE. Numerous low lenticular hills, or hog-backs, interspersed with tarns and lakes, or surrounding "kettle-holes," have impressed a distinctive physiognomy upon the land-surface, and bear testimony to past glacial action and to a broad distribution of glacial drift. The state is crossed by several ridges or water-sheds, which separate the various river-basins from one another. In the SW. a portion of the country is bluffy and broken.

Lakes and Rivers.—Wisconsin contains a large number of lakes, most of which are of small size. The largest lake is Winnebago, in the E., which is connected by Fox River with the Green Bay arm of Lake Michigan. W. of it is Lake Poygan. The Four Lakes of Madison are famed for their beauty. Devil's Lake, a small sheet of water near Baraboo, lies in a wild and picturesque rock-basin. The principal rivers of Wisconsin are the St. Croix, Chippewa, Black, and Wisconsin (which afford considerable steam-navigation, although encumbered by rapids and shifting sands), tributary directly to the Mississippi; the Pecatonica, Rock, and Des Plaines, flowing into Illinois; and the Menominee, Peshtigo, Oconto, and Fox, flowing into Green Bay. The Fox River is connected at Portage City with the Wisconsin by a short canal. Many of the rivers have deep rocky cañons (here called dalles or dells), through which the water rushes in a rapid course, affording much water-power, which is extensively utilized.

Geology.—Virtually the entire state belongs to the Archæan and older Paleozoic ages. The ancient granites, gneisses, and their associates occupy much of the northern section, while southeastward of this tract, and again on the Lake Superior slope, appear the newer sedimentary rocks (Cambrian, Silurian), which prevail over most of the rest of the state. Glacial drift covers the greater part of the surface of the state. The Gogebic and Menominee areas in the N. and minor patches in the E. are rich in iron-ore and have given to the state an important mining industry. In 1899 the output of iron-ore in the state was 579,798 long tons, valued at $837,767, mostly coming from the Gogebic district; the quantity of iron (nearly all red hematite) mined in 1903 was 675,053 tons, valued at $1,542,517. Copper-, lead- and zinc-ores have been worked at several points. Bituminous limestones and valuable cement-rocks abound in various parts.

Climate, etc.—The winters are long and severe, especially in the north, but the dryness and uniformity of the weather render the winter climate far more endurable than that of the northeastern states. Proximity to the Great Lakes serves to temper both the summer and winter climates, and the extremes of temperature are kept in the range from about —25° to 95°–100°. The average annual rainfall somewhat exceeds 30 inches. Much of the state is still forested with pine, fir, hemlock, sugar-maple, and oak, and yields a vast resource in lumber. The southern and western sections are chiefly prairie.

Agricultural Resources.—Excluding a large proportion of the northern Azoic and forest region (which is sparsely settled and has a severe climate and a sterile soil, with much boulder drift and many small marshes), the state ranks high in point of agriculture. Wheat, Indian corn, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, potatoes, hops, tobacco, live-stock, wool, butter, cheese, hay, and maple sugar are leading products. The cultivation of hops is very extensive. The leading agricultural crops in 1900 were: corn, 49,547,240 bushels; wheat, 13,166,599 bushels; oats, 61,971,552 bushels; barley, 6,259,179 bushels; rye, 3,010,437 bushels; buckwheat, 385,462 bushels; potatoes, 15,619,641 bushels; and hay, 1,218,354 tons. Orchard fruits are extensively cultivated, and there is a profitable industry in the cultivation of the cranberry. Much attention is given to the breeding of horses. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 4,719,260 pounds.

Industries.—A large number of busy manufacturing towns have sprung up in this state, favored by the abundant water-power and the cheapness of raw materials. The manufacture of lumber and timber products ranks as the most important industry of the state, the product in 1900 having been valued at $66,035,511. The manufacture of flouring- and grist-mill products ranks second, with a product valued at $26,327,048. Other leading industries are the manufacture of malted liquors, with a product valued at $19,394,709; of foundry and machine-shop products, $22,252,730; leather, $20,074,373; dairy products, $20,120,147; slaughtering and meat-packing, $13,601,125; the manufacture of paper and wood pulp, $10,895,576; iron and steel, $8,905,226; agricultural implements, $7,886,369; carriages and wagons, $6,956,341; furniture, $8,721,823. Lime, cement, bricks, etc., are also important articles of manufacture. The beer and excellent pale bricks of Milwaukee are known throughout the country.

Railroads.—In 1850 there were 20 miles of railroad in the state; in 1860, 905 miles; in 1870, 1525 miles; in 1880, 3139 miles; in 1890, 5615 miles; in 1900, 6566 miles.

Counties.—The state is divided into 71 counties, as follows: Adams, Ashland, Barron, Bayfield, Brown, Buffalo, Burnett, Calumet, Chippewa, Clark, Columbia, Crawford, Dane, Dodge, Door, Douglas, Dunn, Eau Claire, Florence, Fond du Lac, Forest, Gates, Grant, Green, Green Lake, Iowa, Iron, Jackson, Jefferson, Juneau, Kenosha, Kewaunee, La Crosse, Lafayette, Langlade, Lincoln, Manitowoc, Marathon, Marinette, Marquette, Milwaukee, Monroe, Oconto, Oneida, Outagamie, Ozaukee, Pepin, Pierce, Polk, Portage, Price, Racine, Richland, Rock, Sauk, Sawyer, Shawano, Sheboygan, St. Croix, Taylor, Trempealeau, Vernon, Vilas, Walworth, Washburn, Washington, Waukesha, Waupaca, Waushara, Winnebago, and Wood.

Cities.—The principal cities are Milwaukee (pop. in 1900, 285,315), Madison (the capital, 19,164), Oshkosh (28,284), Superior (31,090), Racine (29,102), La Crosse (28,895), Sheboygan (22,962), Green Bay (18,684), Eau Claire (17,517), Marinette (16,195), Appleton (15,085), and Fond du Lac (15,110).

Education.—The leading educational institution of the state is the University of Wisconsin, at Madison, which in 1904 had an attendance of about 3100 students. Other collegiate institutions are: Lawrence University, at Appleton; Beloit College; Gale College, at Galesville; Milton College, at Milton; Racine College; Ripon College, at Ripon; the Northwestern University, at Watertown, etc. State normal schools are maintained at Milwaukee, Oshkosh, Platteville, River Falls, Stevens Point, West Superior, and Whitewater, and a Catholic normal school at St. Francis. The number of academies, seminaries, and parish and conventual schools is large.

Government, etc.—The governor and principal executive officers are chosen for a term of 2 years. The legislature consists of a senate and an assembly, the members of the former being elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. The state sends 11 members to the lower house of Congress.

The population in 1840 (excluding Indians) was 30,945; in 1850, 305,391; in 1860, 775,881; in 1870, 1,054,670; in 1880, 1,315,497; in 1890, 1,686,880; in 1900, 2,069,042, including 6095 Indians, nearly all of whom were settled on Indian reservations. The foreign-born population in 1900 was 515,971, nearly half of whom were Germans. The Norwegians are very numerous.

History.—The first white explorers of Wisconsin were Joliet and Père Marquette, who traversed the region in 1673. The United States obtained a title to the country in the treaty of Paris (1783) terminating the Revolutionary War, but did not obtain possession until a generation later. The region was included in the Northwest Territory. The territory of Wisconsin, with an area vastly exceeding that of the present state, was organized in 1836. In 1848 Wisconsin was admitted as a state into the Union.

Wittenberg, wit'tĕn-bĕRG', a town of Prussia, province of Saxony, on the Elbe, 46 miles NNE. of Merseburg. It is rich in mementoes of the Reformation. The court of the Augusteum contains Luther's house, the first floor of which is now a Luther museum. Near by is the house in which Melanchthon died. In the Stadtkirche Luther preached frequently, and to the doors of the Schlosskirche (which were burned in 1760, but replaced in 1858) he affixed his famous theses on Oct. 31, 1517,—the opening episode of the Reformation. The interior contains his tomb and that of Melanchthon. The dwelling-house of the painter Lucas Cranach the elder is still extant, but has undergone repeated restorations. The famous university of Wittenberg, which was founded in 1502 (when the town was the capital of electoral Saxony) and where Luther taught, was incorporated with the university of Halle in 1817. Its buildings, as well as the old electoral palace, now serve as barracks. The site of the former fortifications, which were razed in 1873, is now occupied by new streets and public promenades. Wittenberg has a number of educational institutions. The manufactures include machinery, spirits, volatile oils, and soap-powder, and there are iron-foundries, flour-mills, brick-yards, etc. Pop. in 1900, 18,345.

Pop. in 1891, 297,389; in 1901, 358,377. Worcestershire is an attractive region, with a surface diversified by hill and valley and a fertile soil. Along the southern portion of the western boundary stretch the Malvern Hills. The Avon, the principal affluent of the Severn, waters the SE. part of the county and the Teme flows to the Severn from the W. Worcestershire is noted for its orchards. There are large sheep pastures. The northern part of the county is a busy manufacturing district. Here are the cities of Dudley (in a coal-producing and iron-manufacturing district, detached from the main body of the county), Kidderminster (famed for its carpets), and Stourbridge. At Droitwich are productive brine springs. The county as such sends 5 members to the House of Commons. Capital, Worcester.

Worcester, a municipal, parliamentary, and county borough of England, capital of the co. of Worcester, on the left bank of the Severn, 25 miles SW. of Birmingham. Its chief feature is the mediæval cathedral, restored by Sir Gilbert Scott, which presents an exterior of striking simplicity, and a noble interior with a superb groined roof. Within the cathedral are the tombs of King John and Prince Arthur (brother of Henry VIII.). Other objects of interest are the old episcopal palace (now the deanery), the guild hall, and numerous quaint timbered houses. The Royal Worcester Porcelain Works, long famous for their product, cover a vast area and employ large numbers of hands. The city has iron- and engine-works and extensive manufactures of gloves, vinegar, chemical manures, and "Worcester sauce." Here on Sept. 3, 1651, Cromwell overwhelmed the army of Charles II. Worms, ŵormz (anc. Borbetom'agus; mod. L. Vorma'tia), a town of the grand-duchy of Hesse, Germany, on the left bank of the Rhine, 26 miles SE. of Mainz. It is an ancient place and the old quarter contains various interesting mediæval relics. The venerable cathedral, consecrated in the twelfth century, with its four round towers and two domes, is a striking example of Romanesque architecture. The Pauluskirche, whose main portion dates from the twelfth century, contains the Paulus museum of Germanic antiquities. Still more ancient is the synagogue (now modernized), one of the oldest in Germany. The late-Gothic Liebfrauenkirche, in the shape of a cruciform basilica, was consecrated in the fifteenth century. On the Lutherplatz is a fine monument to Luther by Rietschel, and near by is the Heyl house, a handsome modern edifice, on the site of the episcopal palace, where Luther appeared before the imperial diet in 1521. Among other modern structures the Romanesque Volkstheater is one of the most striking. A handsome new quarter has arisen to the W. of the town. Some of the towers of the old fortifications are still preserved. The industries of Worms are considerable. They include the manufacture of leather, textiles, chiccory, machinery, chemicals, bone-dust, etc. Choice wine (Liebfrauenmilch) is produced in the vicinity. Pop. in 1900, 40,705.

Worms is one of the most ancient cities of Germany. It was the capital of the Burgundian realm which existed at the time of the fall of the Roman Empire. It very early became the seat of a bishopric. It became flourishing under its bishops, against whose authority it successfully rebelled, becoming a free city, and figures prominently in the mediæval annals of the Holy Roman (German) Empire as the meeting-place of imperial diets. The famous Concordat of Worms between the Emperor Henry V. and Pope Calixtus II., which put an end to the contest regarding investitures, was concluded in 1122. The most celebrated of the diets held at Worms was that of 1521, before which Luther made his defiant stand. In 1689 the city was burned to the ground by the French. It was ceded to France in the treaty of Lunéville in 1801, and was assigned to Hesse-Darmstadt by the congress of Vienna in 1815.

Württemberg, ŵüR'tẽm-bẽRG', a kingdom in the SW. part of Germany, the third state in size of the German Empire, and the fourth in order of population, bounded on the E. by Bavaria, on the NW., W., and SW. by Baden, and on the S. by the Prussian province of Hohenzollern and the Lake of Constance. Württemberg has some small exclaves in Baden and Hohenzollern. It is divided into the circles of the Neckar, Black Forest (Schwarzwald), Danube, and Jagst. Area, 7528 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 2,169,480. About 70 per cent. of the population is Protestant. The principal towns are Stuttgart (the capital), Ulm, Heilbronn, Esslingen, Cannstatt, and Reutlingen.

The surface of the country is largely mountainous. In the SW. is part of the Black Forest, one of whose peaks, the Hornisgrinde, about 3800 feet in height, is the loftiest mountain in Württemberg. The Swabian Alps stretch from Hohenzollern about 80 miles NE., uniting on the SW. with the Black Forest, and separating the basins of the Neckar and the Danube, the two principal rivers. The chief affluents of the Neckar are the Kocher, Jagst, and Enz. The Danube traverses Württemberg in a NE. direction. Its largest tributary is the Iller, on the Bavarian border. About one-fifth of Lake Constance belongs to Württemberg; the next largest lake is the Federsee, in the S.

The climate is temperate, the mean annual temperature being about 47°. The soil is mostly fertile, especially in the picturesque valleys of the Neckar and the Tauber, and on the Lake of Constance, in which regions the cultivation of the vine is successfully carried on. The Neckar wines are the best. Fruit-trees thrive everywhere. The chief agricultural products are grain, beets, potatoes, hops, tobacco, flax, and hemp. The Black Forest yields valuable timber. Bee-keeping is extensively carried on and the fisheries are considerable. Iron-ore and salt are the most important mineral products. The salt-works and a number of foundries are owned by the state. There are rich quarries of building-stone. Among the mineral springs those of Wildbad are the most famous.

Although Württemberg is mainly an agricultural country, many of its industries have reached a high degree of development, such as the manufacture of gold- and silver-ware, machinery, clocks, pianos, organs, surgical and optical instruments, paper, chocolate, and artistic furniture. Stuttgart is the most important publishing centre in southern Germany, and the establishments connected with the graphic arts enjoy a high reputation. There are large sugar-refineries, brick-yards, and breweries, and the manufacture of textiles, chemicals, dye-stuffs, cement, gunpowder, cotton-thread, metal wares, hosiery, and sparkling wines is carried on extensively.

Württemberg has long been noted for the excellence of its higher educational establishments and the general diffusion of public instruction. The University of Tübingen is celebrated. The technological and agricultural schools are among the foremost of their kind, and the conservatory of music at Stuttgart has a world-wide reputation.

The government of Württemberg is a constitutional monarchy. The constitution dates from 1819. The legislature consists of 2 chambers. The first is composed of princes of the blood, nobles, and members appointed by the king. The second chamber is composed of 13 members of the lower nobility, 6 Evangelical and 3 Catholic dignitaries, the chancellor of the university of Tübingen, 7 representatives of towns, and 63 representatives of rural districts, the last-named 70 members being chosen by direct election. There is universal suffrage and the ballot is secret. Württemberg has 4 seats in the Bundesrat and sends 17 members to the Reichstag. The mediæval county of Württemberg was erected into a duchy in 1495. The state was elevated to the rank of a kingdom in 1806. In 1871 it became a member of the new German Empire.

Würzburg, ŵüRts'bŏŏRG, a town of Bavaria, Germany, capital of the district of Lower Franconia, 140 miles NW. of Munich, picturesquely situated on the right bank of the Main. It is one of the oldest cities in Germany. The Romanesque cathedral, with a richly decorated choir, dates from the eleventh century; the handsome Gothic Marienkapelle, begun in the fourteenth century, contains interesting statues; the Neuminster church, dating from the eleventh century, has a fine Romanesque tower and contains a tablet in memory of the minnesinger Walther von der Vogelweide, whose tomb was in the old cloisters, demolished in 1833. The venerable church of St. Burkard, erected in the eleventh century, is externally the best preserved of the old ecclesiastical structures. The town-hall has a council room which is a striking example of mediæval architecture. The royal palace, formerly the residence of the bishops of Würzburg, is one of the most striking examples of the rococo style in Germany. The old part of the town is surrounded by attractive promenades; the new quarter contains fine modern edifices. On the Residenzplatz, the largest square, stands the handsome Luitpold fountain, erected in 1893. The Domstrasse, one of the principal thoroughfares, leads to the old Main bridge, adorned with statues, which dates from the fifteenth century. The Frankenwarte, on the neighboring Nikolausberg (1090 feet high), commands a fine view of the valley of the Rhine and the encircling hills. Opposite the town rises the fortress of Marienberg, on the site of an ancient castle.

Würzburg is rich in educational institutions. The university had 1368 students in 1904. The buildings contain zoological, mineralogical, and geological collections, an art-history museum, a collection of sculptures, coins and antiquities, and a picture-gallery. The town has a botanical garden, a royal music school, and institutions for the blind, deaf-mute, etc. The vast Julius Hospital, founded in 1576, is an admirably equipped institution. The industries of Würzburg are varied and include the manufacture of machinery, printing presses, tobacco, sparkling wines, vinegar, liqueurs, and chocolate, and beer-brewing. Excellent wine is produced in the vicinity. Pop. in 1900, 75,499.

Wyoming, wī-o'ming, a western state of the American Union, bounded on the N. by Montana, E. by South Dakota and Nebraska, S. by Colorado and Utah, and W. by Utah, Idaho, and Montana. Its boundaries are the parallels of 41° and 45° N. lat. and the meridians of 104° 3′ and 111° 3′ W. lon. Area of the land-surface, 97,890 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 315 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—The state belongs to the great plateau region that abuts against and is partially traversed by arms of the Rocky Mountains, and its general surface is elevated 5000–7000 feet or more above the level of the sea. The main chain of the Rocky Mountains, known in its central and dominant mass as the Wind River Range, extends in a NW.–SE. direction through a large part of the state, and constitutes the water-parting ("continental divide") between the streams flowing to the Atlantic and the Pacific basins. The western and southwestern portions of the state are drained principally by the Green and Snake rivers (the former one of the head-streams of the Colorado, the latter the chief tributary of the Columbia) and their many tributaries. Among the subordinate ranges of this section of the state are the Salt River Range, the Teton Range (with the Grand Teton, 13,671 ft.), the Grosventre Range, the Shoshone Mountains, and the Snow Mountains, the last-named entering from Montana. In the extreme NW. part of the state is almost the whole of the YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK (which see), a wonderland of mountains, cañons, hot springs, and geysers, which exhibits the evidences of comparatively recent volcanic action on a magnificent scale. Fremont Peak, the highest peak of the Wind River Mountains (13,790 ft.), is also the culminating point of the state. The Atlantic or northeastern slope of the state is drained by the Yellowstone, Big Horn, Powder, Belle Fourche, Cheyenne, and North Platte rivers, and their numerous tributaries,—all direct or indirect affluents of the Missouri. The SE. section of Wyoming is again broken by mountain buttresses. Between the Medicine Bow spur of the Rocky Mountains on the SW. and the Laramie Mountains on the NE. lie the great Laramie Plains, a cold and elevated region, some of whose surrounding peaks are clad with eternal snows. These plains, which fall off gently to the E. and to the W., mark an interruption or break in the continuity of the Rocky Mountain axis. Northward and northeastward from the Laramie Mountains there is a prairie- or plain-region, crossed by low anticlinals, which connects the Laramie Mountains with the Big Horn Mountains to the N. and the Bear Lodge Mountains, with their fantastic volcanic "necks," on the NE. Characteristic features in the landscapes of southern Wyoming are the flat-topped hills, or "buttes," rising in valleys or upon plains, and often presenting the appearance of walled cities, ruined castles, pyramids, and mounds. Among the lofty summits of the state not already mentioned are: Mount Leidy, 11,177 ft.; Moran, 12,800 ft.; Medicine Peak, 12,231 ft.; Chimney Rock, 11,853 ft.; and Chauvenet Peak, 13,000 ft. The most noted lakes of the state are the large Yellowstone Lake (in the national reserve), Shoshone Lake, the source of the Snake River, and Lake Jackson, traversed by the Snake River.

Geology.—The principal mountain-systems may be said to be composed of a core, or nucleus, of granitic or syenitic rock, or quartzite, with borders exhibiting Silurian, Devonian, Carboniferous, Triassic, Jurassic, Cretaceous, and Tertiary strata; but most of the plain or prairie country is Cretaceous or Tertiary. In the Yellowstone National Park there are abundant evidences of recent volcanic action. Gold and silver are fairly abundant, but the quantity of these metals mined is insignificant. Some tin-ore (cassiterite) has been obtained in Crook co. Iron is found throughout a large part of the state, and an excellent quality of lignitic and bituminous coal of Tertiary origin is mined upon an extensive scale, especially in the SW. areas. This coal supplies the Pacific railroads and much of the population of the plains with a cheap and serviceable fuel. The total product in 1903, obtained chiefly from Sweetwater and Uinta cos., was 4,635,293 short tons, valued at $5,731,281. Gypsum, salt, soda, soda-sulphate, graphite, copper (product in 1903, 1,023,189 pounds; in 1900, 4,230,776 pounds), lead, sulphur, etc., are other useful mineral products. The yield of petroleum, which appears to be most abundant in the northern and central parts of the state, promises to become important. Mineral waters abound.

Climate.—Wyoming enjoys in general a healthful climate, dry in nearly all sections of the state, although the extremes of both summer and winter temperatures are well accentuated. The range of temperature throughout most years is from —35° to 105°, but exceptional minima and maxima considerably extend this range. The mean January temperature at Cheyenne is about 25°. The rainfall, except on the lofty mountains, is everywhere deficient, the average precipitation for the state being about 13 inches.

Agriculture, Industries.—The principal cereals, except Indian corn, do well here, but the soil is better suited to turnips, potatoes, peas, beans, and other like crops. The Laramie Plains have short summers and long, severe winters. Pastoral pursuits, and especially wool-growing, promise better here than does farm-tillage. The soil everywhere requires irrigation to make it productive. Work in this direction is being actively prosecuted, and there are already in the state more than 5000 miles of irrigation ditches. The chief agricultural crops in 1900 were: wheat, 366,414 bushels; corn, 81,702 bushels; oats, 630,272 bushels; potatoes, 388,179 bushels; and hay, 493,446 tons. At present the mining of coal and the rearing and tending of sheep and cattle are the leading industries of Wyoming, the state having held in 1900 the second position among the wool-producing states of the Union. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 21,549,231 pounds. The mountains, which are generally well wooded with pines and other coniferous trees, afford timber, from which lumber and railroad-ties are sawn. Besides this, there is some quartz-milling, and considerable railroad-repairing and machine-work are done at the principal towns along the main line of railroad. There is a large amount of water-power developed in the mountains and cañons.

Railroads.—The total length of railroads in 1890 was 1003 miles; in 1900, 1370 miles.

Education.—Laramie is the seat of the state university, the University of Wyoming.

Counties and Towns.—There are 13 counties, besides the Yellowstone National Park: Albany, Bighorn, Carbon, Converse, Crook, Fremont, Johnson, Laramie, Natrona, Sheridan, Sweetwater, Uinta, and Weston. The largest towns are Cheyenne, the capital (pop. in 1900, 14,087); Laramie, an important industrial and commercial town (8207); Rock Springs (4363), Rawlins, and Evanston, in the vicinity of extensive coal-mines.

Government, etc.—The governor and executive officers are elected for 4 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of the former being elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. Women have the right of suffrage. Wyoming Territory was organized in 1868 from portions of Dakota, Idaho, and Utah. The state was admitted into the Union in 1890. It sends 1 member to the lower house of the national Congress.

Population.—The inhabitants in 1870, exclusive of Indians, numbered 9118. The population in 1880 was 20,789; in 1890, 60,705; in 1900, 92,531, including 1801 Indians located on reservations.

Wyoming Mountain, Pa., in Luzerne co., extends 15 or 20 miles along the SE. bank of the Susquehanna, bordering the Wyoming Valley.

Wyoming Valley, Luzerne co., Pa., in the course of the North (East) Branch of the Susquehanna River, is about 20 miles in length and 3–4 miles broad. The Wyoming Mountain extends along its SE. border. The Susquehanna enters the valley through the Lackawannock Gap and leaves it through the Nanticoke Gap. Few sections of the state present more beautiful and varied scenery than that of the Wyoming Valley. Its chief settlement is Wilkesbarre. The first white settlers in the valley came from Connecticut in the years preceding the Revolution, and the possession of the district was in dispute between Connecticut and Pennsylvania until after the close of the struggle. The battle and "massacre" of Wyoming (July 3, 1778), an episode of the Revolutionary War, took place at Fort Forty, about 4 miles from the present site of Wilkesbarre.

Yakutsk, yå'kootsk', a province of Siberia, occupying the greater part of the eastern half of that country, and extending from the government of Yeniseisk on the W. (about lon. 104° E.) to Primorskaya or the Littoral Province on the E. (lon. 171° E.), and from the Arctic Ocean on the N. to the Amur region on the S. The Yablonoi Mountains form a portion of the S. boundary, and on the SE. and E. it has the Stanovoi Range or escarpment. The New Siberian Islands belong to the province. Area, 1,533,397 sq. m. Pop. in 1897, 261,731. It is watered by the Lena and its tributaries (Vilyui, Aldan, Olekma, and Vitim, the last forming the frontier with the government of Irkutsk), the Olenek, Yana, Indigirka, Kolyma, and other streams, whose major waters are directed northward to the Arctic Ocean. West of the Lena the region is largely in the form of a plain, and eastward of it mountainous (Verkhoyansk and Kolyma mountains, etc.). The province is the coldest in Siberia, with an average winter temperature in many places of —30° or less, and a summer temperature of only 48°–50°. At Yakutsk and at Verkhoyansk the thermometer has been known to register —88° and —90°. Despite this condition, and with the soil frozen permanently (except for a short depth at the surface) for hundreds of feet, forest-land extends to the Arctic Circle and even beyond. In some of the more southerly parts rye, barley, and small quantities of other grains are raised, and herds of cattle are reared near Yakutsk. Gold has been mined in fairly large quantities. The principal trade is in furs, mammoth tusks, and walrus-teeth. Capital, Yakutsk.

Yang-ho, yäng'ho', a river of China, province of Chi-li, unites with the Sang-kan-ho to form the Hoen-ho, which traverses the province SW. of Peking.

Yang-tse-kiang, yäng'tsä ke-ång' (i.e., the "son of the great water," or the "son of the sea"), more commonly called by the Chinese Ta-kiang, tä'ke-ång', or "Great River," and sometimes written on old maps Kiang-ku, one of the great rivers of Asia, whose course is mainly in China, rises (as the Kin-sha-kiang) by several head-streams (Di-chu, Chu-mar) in the mountains of the Kuen-lun system in central Tibet, immediately S. of the Koko-nor basin. The Marco Polo Mountains separate its upper waters from those of the Hoang-ho, while the Tanla Mountains, on the S., form the water-parting with the Mekong. The river flows ESE. to China proper, traverses the province of Yun-nan, and on the borders of Sze-chuen receives from the N. the Ya-long-kiang, which by some geographers is considered to be one of the forks of the Yang-tse-kiang. Most of its course to this point is directed through longitudinal mountain valleys. Thenceforth the Yang-tse-kiang has a very tortuous ENE. course through the provinces of Sze-chuen, Hu-peh, Kiang-si (the extreme N. part), Nganhwei, and Kiang-su, and enters the Yellow Sea by an estuary 30 miles across, in lat. 32° N. The Yang-tse-kiang receives numerous affluents in its course through China (Min, Kialing, Han, from the N.; Wu, Heng, Kan, from the S.), some of which are navigable for fairly long courses, and by which it drains all the central provinces of China. Enormous quantities of silt are brought down by the river, the discharge of sediment at its mouth being estimated to be about 6,000,000,000 cubic feet annually (about a sixth less than the sediment discharged by the Mississippi River). The river is crossed by the Grand (Imperial) Canal, by which it communicates with the Hoang-ho and with most parts of China proper. The tide ascends it to Lake Po-yang, 450 miles from the sea, and it is accessible to ocean steamers for a farther distance of 150 miles, or as far as Hankow. River steamboats ascend to I-chang, about 160 miles W. by N. of Hankow (about 500 miles by water), beyond which it is unsuited for navigation, being largely a turbulent stream, passing through wild and narrow gorges. Native boats (rafts) are "tracked" over some parts of these less accessible waters, and the serviceable course of the river is thus extended to Ping-shan-hsien, about 1500 miles. The total length of the Yang-tse-kiang is estimated to be about 3000 miles. The fleet of Yang-tse-kiang steamboats comprises some of the largest river steamboats in the world. Among the important cities on the Yang-tse-kiang are Chung-king, I-chang, King-chow, Han-yang, Hankow, Wu-chang, Chi-chow, Nanking, and Ching-kiang.

It is situated about 20 miles above the rapids of the river, which greatly obstruct navigation. Yekaterinoslav is an important commercial and industrial place. It is a seat of the iron- and steel-industry and has large flour-mills. It is a modern town, dating from the reign of Catharine II. Pop. in 1897, 121,216.

Yela'buga, a town of Russia, government and 210 miles SSE. of Vyatka, near the river Kama. Pop. in 1897, 9776.

Yelagui, yā-lā-goo'ee, or Elagui, ā-lā-goo'ee, a river of Siberia, in the government of Yeniseisk, flows E. and NE. and discharges into the Yenisei on the left, in about lat. 64° N. and lon. 86° 25' E. Length, 200 miles.

Yelatom, yā-lā-tom', or Jelatma, yā-lät'mā, a town of Russia, government and 158 miles N. of Tambov, on the Oka. Pop. in 1897, 4533.

Yelets', a town of Russia, government and 102 miles ESE. of Orel, on the Sosna. Among the industries are tanning, iron-founding, milling, and lace-making. There is an active trade. Pop. in 1897, 37,455.

Yelisavetgrad, yā-le'zā-vĕt-grād', a town of Russia, government and 130 miles N. of Kherson, on the Ingul. It is regularly built, with spacious streets. It has many industrial establishments, prominent among which are the flour-mills and tobacco-factories. It has a large trade. Pop. in 1897, 61,800.

Yelisavetpol, or Elisavetpol, a government of the Russian Empire, in Transcaucasia, bordering on the SE. upon Persia. Area, 16,721 sq. m. It is a part of the former kingdom of Georgia. The northern part is traversed by the river Kur, and its affluent, the Aras, flows along the Persian border. The eastern part is largely a region of steppes, but most of the government is mountainous, being traversed by the ranges of the Little Caucasus. There are extensive forests and fine pastures on the mountain slopes and fertile fields in the valleys, yielding good crops of grain and other products. Much wine is made and silkworms are reared. Copper is mined. The Russians constitute but a small fraction of the inhabitants, the bulk of whom are Tartars and Armenians. Capital, Yelisavetpol. Pop. in 1897, 871,557.

Yelisavetpol, yā-le'zā-vĕt-pŏl', a town of the Russian Empire, in Transcaucasia, capital of the government of Yelisavetpol, 90 miles SE. of Tiflis. It presents in great part an Oriental appearance with its old fortifications, its numerous mosques, and the narrow streets of its extensive Mohammedan quarters, but there is also a modern portion which has arisen under Russian rule. There are a number of Armenian churches. The city is connected by rail with Tiflis. Many remains of antiquity are found in the vicinity. Pop. in 1897, 33,100.

Yell, one of the Shetland Islands, Scotland, the second of the group in size, and lying between Mainland (Pomona) and Unst. Length, from N. to S., about 17 miles. The surface is mountainous and agriculture is almost entirely neglected, fishing being the chief industry. Pop. about 2600.

Yell, a county in the W. part of Arkansas, has an area of 955 sq. m. It is bounded on the NE. by the Arkansas River and is intersected by the Fourche la Fave and Petit Jean rivers. Bituminous coal is found here. Capitals, Danville and Dardanelle. Pop. in 1890, 18,015; in 1900, 22,750.

Yellow Sea (Chinese, Whang-hai, hwâng'hī'), an arm of the Pacific Ocean, between China (provinces of Chi-li, Shan-tung, Kiang-su) on the W., Manchuria (Shing-king) on the N., and Korea on the E. It opens southward into the Eastern Sea, and in the N. forms the bays or gulfs of Korea, Liao-tung, and Pe-chi-li, the last two being separated from the main body of water by the extension into it of the Liao-tung peninsula (near the extremity of which is Port Arthur) from the N. and the Shan-tung peninsula from the S. Greatest width, about 400 miles. Shortest distance between the Shan-tung peninsula and Korea, about 115 miles. It receives the Hoang-ho in the Gulf of Pe-chi-li, the Liao in the Gulf of Liao-tung, and the Yalu in the Bay of Korea, the first-named discharging into it enormous quantities of sediment. The main arm of the Yang-tse-kiang discharges immediately S. of the Yellow Sea. The Yellow Sea is shallow and obtains its name from the yellow mud that is thrown into it.

Yellowspring, a post-hamlet of Blair co., Pa., about 14 miles E. of Altoona.

Yellowspring, a post-village of Hampshire co., W.Va. The banking point is Winchester, Va.

Yellowstone, a county in the south-central part of Montana. Area, 3710 sq. m. It is bounded on the SE. and S. by the Yellowstone River. Coal is found here. Capital, Billings. Pop. in 1900, 6212.

Yellowstone, a post-station of Lafayette co., Wis.

Yellowstone Lake, Wyo., lies at the E. base of the Rocky Mountains, in the Yellowstone National Park, at an elevation of 7740 feet above the level of the sea. Its greatest length is about 18 miles. Its outlet is the Yellowstone River, which issues from the northern end of the lake. The Upper Yellowstone River enters at the opposite side. This lake is surrounded on several sides by lofty mountains.

Yellowstone Mountains, Mont., a range of mountains extending along the eastern side of the Yellowstone River, commencing near the Lower Cañon and ending abruptly in the bend of the Yellowstone, near the entrance of the Shields River. Emigrant Peak is 10,969 feet in height.

Yellowstone National Park, a United States national reserve, intended as a general pleasure-ground and game-preserve, chiefly in the NW. part of Wyoming, with narrow adjacent strips in Montana and Idaho. It covers a surface, as the park proper, about 62 miles in length (from N. to S.) and 54 miles in width, with an area of 3350 sq. m. To this region, as originally circumscribed, a forest-preserve of some 2000 sq. m. has been added on the E. and the S., giving a full area to the park of somewhat over 5500 sq. m. The Yellowstone National Park in the manifold type of scenery that it presents, in its exposition of rare geological and physical phenomena, and in its wondrous display of vivid and bizarre coloring, stands alone among the curiosities of nature. Its most distinctive physiographic features are embodied in profound cañons and lofty water-falls, vast sheets of superimposed lava, lofty volcanic cones (all extinct), thousands of hot springs (calcareous, silicious, etc.), many of them encrusting and depositing sinter, and a hundred or more active geysers. Its general surface is a broken lava plateau,—an extension of the vast Snake River lava-sheets that were thrown out in the Tertiary period,—elevated about 8000 feet above sea-level and surrounded by mountain ridges and buttresses, the most prominent of which are the Gallatin Range in the NW. and the Absaroka Range in the E. Among the more prominent mountain summits (nearly all of volcanic character) are Electric Peak, in the NW. (11,155 ft.), Mount Washburn, in the N. (10,345 ft.), Cathedral Peak (10,700 ft.), Mount Schurz (10,900 ft.), Mount Langford (10,780 ft.), Mount Doane (10,715 ft.), and Mount Stevenson (10,420 ft.), in the E. and east-centre; Mount Sheridan (10,335 ft.), in the S.; and Mount Holmes (10,528 ft.), in the Gallatin Range of the NW. A portion of the "continental divide" lies in the SW. part. The region is drained by the Yellowstone River, which enters from the SE. (Upper Yellowstone), traverses the Yellowstone Lake (area, 140 sq. m.; elevation, 7740 ft. above sea-level,—one of the largest of the world's lakes occupying so lofty a situation), and passes out from the park in the central portion of the northern boundary, after a turbulent course through deep and wildly romantic cañons. (See YELLOWSTONE RIVER.) Shoshone, Lewis, and Hart lakes, minor bodies of water, lie SW. of Yellowstone Lake. Among the more notable locations and objects in the preserve are the Falls of the Yellowstone, the Mammoth Hot Springs, in the N., with their striking terraces and basins of exquisitely colored calcareous deposits and waters (covering an area of nearly 200 acres; temperature of the waters ranging to 165° or more); the Obsidian Cliffs (150–250 ft. in height), S. of the Mammoth Hot Springs; and the Norris, Lower Geyser, and Upper Geyser basins, which occupy a nearly meridional position in respect to one another in the western part of the park. In these several basins is the finest exhibition of geyser phenomena to be found on the globe. Among the individual geysers may be noted Old Faithful (with a jet 125–150 ft. in height), Beehive (jet, 150–200 ft.), Grand (200 ft.), Giant (250 ft.), Grotto, Castle, Monarch, and Fountain. Much the larger part of the park is densely forested (Douglas spruce, yellow pine, poplar, etc.), and in its recesses numerous forms of game find a safe retreat (elk, deer, bear, big-horn, buffalo, cougar, etc.). The Madison River, one of the forks of the Missouri, has its source in the W. part of the park.

Yellowstone Park, a post-station in the Yellowstone National Park. The banking point is Livingston, Mont.

Yellowstone River, the largest affluent of the Missouri, rises in the Rocky Mountains of Wyoming, on the "continental divide," in about lat. 44° N. and lon. 109° 30′ W. After a course of about 40 miles, it enters YELLOWSTONE LAKE (which see), at an altitude of 7740 feet above the sea. Issuing from the northern end of this lake, it runs northward through the Yellowstone National Park, and forms two grand cataracts, the Upper and the Lower Falls, respectively 110 and 310 ft. high, the latter plunging into the abyss known as the Grand Cañon of the Yellowstone, a stupendous and marvellously colored gorge, extending in the course of the river upward of 20 miles, and having a depth between precipitous rocks of 600–1500 ft. Passing through the so-called Third Cañon the river enters Montana, in which it runs northward through a mountainous country. Near the mouth of the Shields River it emerges from the mountains into the plains and runs in an ENE. and NE. direction, and enters the Missouri a short distance beyond the North Dakota boundary, in lat. 47° 59′ N. Its length is estimated at 1100 miles. Its mouth is about 2000 ft. above the level of the sea. Steamboats can ascend it to the mouth of the Big Horn, 300 miles or more, during high water. Its largest affluents are the Big Horn and the Powder rivers, both of which enter from the right. See YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Yellow Sulphur, a post-station of Blount co., Tenn.

Yellow Sulphur Springs, a post-hamlet and resort of Montgomery co., Va., 3½ miles from Christiansburg and 80 miles W. of Lynchburg.

Yellville, a banking post-town, capital of Marion co., Ark., on an affluent of the White River, about 120 miles N. by W. of Little Rock. Pop. in 1900, 578.

Yelm, a post-village of Thurston co., Wash., on the Northern Pacific R., 26 miles S. of Tacoma.

Yelverton, a post-village of Hardin co., Ohio, on the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis R., 9 miles SSW. of Kenton.

Yelvington, a post-village of St. John co., Fla. Pop. 90.

Yelvington, a post-village of Daviess co., Ky., 10 miles NE. of Owensboro. Pop. about 300.

Yemamah, yĕm-ä'mä, or Yemameh, a district of Nejd, with a valley (wady) of its own name, regarded as the garden of Arabia. Lat. about 24° N.; lon. 47° 30′ E.

Yem'assee', a post-village of Hampton co., S.C., on the Atlantic Coast Line and the Charleston and Western Carolina R., 53 miles W. of Charleston.

Yem'bo, or Yanbo, yän'bo, a maritime town of Arabia, in Hejaz, on a low, sandy, and bare tract near the Red Sea, 125 miles SW. of Medina, of which city it is the port. It has a sheltered harbor and some trade. Yembo is a place of transit for pilgrims from Egypt to the holy cities of Arabia.

Yemen, yĕm′ĕn, a region of southwestern Arabia (the SW. angle of the peninsula), bordering on the Red Sea, and extending southward to the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. It adjoins the British Territory of Aden on the S. Since 1899 the region (the Arabia Felix of the Romans), which constituted the Turkish vilayet of Yemen, is comprised in the four vilayets of Asir (sometimes considered to be a part of Hejaz), Hodeida, Sana, and Tais. It covers an area of about 74,000 sq. m., with a population estimated at 750,000. Yemen is generally mountainous in character, with lofty plateau-masses (8000–10,000 feet) extending into the interior. These mountains are bordered along the Red Sea by low-lying, parched, and in many places saline plains, which were at one time seemingly the floor of the ocean. These enter into the formation of the littoral, or what here and farther to the N. is known as the Tehama. There is some agriculture, but stock-raising is the principal pursuit. The chief towns are Sana and Damar, in the interior, and the ports of Mocha and Hodeida. Much of the best Arabian coffee is associated with this region.

Yenangyoung, yĕn‘ăng-yŏwng′, a town of Upper Burma, on the Irawadi, 110 miles SW. of Ava. It is a great depot for petroleum, which is obtained here. Pop. about 5000.

Yen-chow, a city of China. See YAN-CHOW.

Yendi, yĕn′dee, a town of western equatorial Africa, in Togoland, in about lat. 9° N. Pop. about 12,000.

Yendua, yĕn-doo′ă, one of the Fiji Islands, South Pacific Ocean, W. of Sandalwood Bay. On its S. side is Porpoise Harbor.

Yengan, a town of China. See YEN-NGAN-FU.

Yengi-Hissar, or Yengishar, a town of Chinese Turkestan. See YANG-HISSAR.

Yenidje, a small town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, 25 miles WNW. of Saloniki.

Yenikale, yĕn-ik′ă-lă, a small town and a fortress of Russia, at the E. extremity of the Crimea, on the Strait of Yenikale (or of Kertch), near its N. end, about 6 miles E. of Kertch.

Yenikale, Strait of (now better known as the Strait of Kertch, the Cimmerian Bosporus of the ancients), the channel connecting the Sea of Azov with the Black Sea, and separating the peninsula of the Crimea on the W. from the peninsula of Taman on the E. Its length is about 25 miles. Near its N. entrance it narrows down to a width of between 2 and 3 miles. Where it opens into the Black Sea it is about 6 miles across. In the middle it sends an extensive arm eastward, the Bay of Taman. On the Crimean side are the town of Kertch and the fortress of Yenikale.

Yenisei, yĕn‘e-să′ (written also Jenisei), a river of Siberia, and one of the largest rivers of the globe, rises (as generally understood by geographers) as the Ulu-Kem in the mountains of northern Mongolia (in Kobdo), in about lat. 50° 35′ N. and lon. 99° 55′ E. It flows at first NW. to the Siberian frontier, breaks through the Sayan Mountains in a northerly course, and enters upon the great Siberian plain at Krasnoyarsk, whence its course follows the gentle decline of the land in the direction of the Arctic Sea to its mouth in the estuary or Bay of Yenisei, in lat. 70° N. The river has a length of about 2700–3000 miles, throughout the greater part of which it is navigable, its course being mainly within Russian territory. River steamers ascend to Minusinsk (about 1750 miles), while large craft (including ocean steamers) may reach Yeniseisk. The Yenisei is in general of very considerable width, expanding in some of its lower reaches to 4–5 miles, and has a generous depth (as far as the rapids of Ossinovskoye not less than 6 fathoms). In the month of May, following upon the melting of the snow and ice, the water frequently stands 30 feet or more above normal level. It traverses vast areas of forest-land, and in its lower and middle course inhospitable ice-bound plains and tundra. At Krasnoyarsk the river is generally frozen from the middle of November to May, and the mouth is rarely open for more than a few weeks in the year, so that the river is ill-suited for direct commercial relations with the outside. The chief tributaries of the Yenisei are the Angara or Upper Tunguska (flowing from Lake Baikal, and which should, perhaps, be properly considered to be the main Yenisei), the Stony Tunguska and the Lower Tunguska, all from the right. There are no comparable streams entering from the left. By means of the Kas, the Ket tributary of the Obi, and some canalized waters, the Yenisei is put in direct communication with the more westerly of the great rivers of Siberia. The river is crossed by the Transsiberian railway at Krasnoyarsk. The area of the drainage-basin is estimated to be about 1,000,000 sq. m.

Yenisei, Bay of, the estuary formed by the river Yenisei at its discharge into the Arctic Ocean, extends between about lat. 70° and 73° N. It abounds in islands.

Yeniseisk, or Jeniseisk, yĕn‘e-sâsk′ or yen‘e-să′isk, a government of Asiatic Russia, comprised in official East Siberia, and extending from the Sayan Mountains, on the Mongolian frontier, on the S. to the Arctic Ocean on the N., and having the governments of Tomsk and Tobolsk on the W., and Irkutsk and the province of Yakutsk on the E. Area, 987,186 sq. m. Pop. in 1897, 560,000. Its extent is nearly commensurate with the basin of the Yenisei. Its most northerly point is Cape Tchelyuskin (Northeast Cape), the extremity of the Taimyr peninsula, which is also the northernmost point of Eurasia. The region, except in the S., has but few true mountain elevations, declining gradually in the direction of the Arctic Sea. It contains much forest-land (of pine, larch, birch, etc.), but it is largely tundra and frozen soil beyond lat. 70° N., and there is considerable swamp-land in the NE. Apart from the Yenisei and its tributaries (Angara, Stony, and Lower Tunguska), it is watered by the Pyasma and Khatanga, both of which flow directly into the Arctic Ocean. Various cereals are cultivated, and considerable live-stock (including the reindeer) is bred. Gold is and has been extensively mined in the southern sections, and several thousand men are employed in this industry. Capital, Krasnoyarsk.

Yeniseisk, a city of Asiatic Russia, on the Yenisei, in lat. 58° 27′ N., lon. 92° 16′ E., about 210 miles N. by W. of Krasnoyarsk. It has several churches and convents, boys' and girls' gymnasia, museum and library, and a fairly active trade. Pop. in 1897, 11,739.

Yenne, yĕnn, a small town of France, in Savoy, on the Rhone, 12 miles NW. of Chambéry.

Yen-ngan-fu, yĕn‘ngăn‘foo′, or Yengan, a town of China, in Shen-si, capital of a department, 170 miles N. by E. of Si-ngan.

Yenotayevsk, yă-no-tă′yĕvsk, a town of Russia, in Astrakhan, on an arm of the Volga. Pop. about 3000.

Yen-ping, a city of China. See YAN-PHING.

Yezd, a city of central Persia, about 160 miles ESE. of Ispahan. It is situated (elevation, 3800 feet) on several important caravan routes and has an extensive trade and some manufacturing industries. Among the inhabitants are many Parsees, or Ghebers (fire-worshippers), this being nearly the only place in Persia which they inhabit. Pop. estimated at 50,000 (?).

Yezdikhast, yĕz'de-kåst′, a town of Persia, on the borders of Fars and Irak-Ajemi, about 80 miles SSE. of Ispahan. It is situated at an elevation of about 6500 feet.

Yezo (officially called Hokkaido, hŏk-kī′do), the northernmost of the main islands of Japan, separated on the S. from Hondo by the Strait of Tsugaru (or Sangar), and extending N. to lat. 45° 30′ N., where La Pérouse Strait separates it from the island of Saghalin. Area, 36,299 sq. m. The island is essentially mountainous, with summits rising to 7000–8000 feet (Tokachi-Dake, in the north-centre, about 8200 ft.; Shribetsu, in the SW. and overlooking Volcano Bay, 7850 ft.; Ishikari, 7700 ft.). Active and semi-active volcanoes form a link with those of the Kurile chain of islands. Yezo is densely forested, and its interior was until recently accessible only with difficulty; but two or more lines of steam-railway now cross it in different directions. The climate is the least hospitable of any portion of Japan. There is a lingering winter, with much snow, lasting for several months, and during this period much of the coast-line is ice-bound. The island abounds in game. Gold is mined sparingly, but there are extensive deposits of coal (near Poronai-buto). The chief towns of the island are the important seaport of Hakodate, in the SW., Otaru, on Ishikari Bay, and Sapporo, connected with Otaru by rail. Pop. in 1904, 843,717, of whom about 18,000 or more were Ainos.

Yi, yee, a river of Uruguay, flows W. and joins the Rio Negro after a course of about 120 miles.

Yosemite Valley, a profound gorge or rift of the Sierra Nevada of California, in Mariposa co., about 180 miles E. by S. of San Francisco, noted for its imposing scenery of stupendous mountain-walls and lofty waterfalls. The valley, which is traversed by the Merced River, an affluent of the San Joaquin, is about 8 miles in length and generally less than a mile in width. Its floor, in great part a park-like expanse of flat and partially timbered meadow-land, is elevated about 3850 feet above sea-level, with the surrounding granitic cliffs rising 3000–5000 ft. higher. The valley, together with the enclosing mountains, presents evidence of past glaciation on the grandest scale, and it is assumed by many geologists that its peculiar form is primarily the result of glacial wear. Other geologists incline to the view that it represents a sunken trough of the earth's surface. Among the chief scenic features of the valley and its surroundings are the magnificent and nearly vertical cliff known as El Capitan, marking the NW. entrance to the valley, 7012 ft. in height; Eagle Peak, 7751 ft.; Cathedral Rocks, 8831 ft.; Sentinel Rocks, 7005 ft.; Sentinel Dome, 8205 ft. (adjacent to which is Glacier Point, a famous point of view, 7292 ft.); North Dome, 7525 ft.; Half (or South) Dome, the SE. buttress of the valley, 8927 ft.; and the numerous waterfalls and cascades which are discharged from prodigious heights over the mountain-walls. Among these the first place is held by the Yosemite Falls (falls of Yosemite Creek), which in three leaps (Upper Fall, 1436 ft. vertical; Middle Fall, 626 ft.; Lower Fall, 400 ft.) drop nearly half a mile; the creek at the point of its upper discharge is 35 ft. in width. Other hardly less picturesque falls are the Bridal Veil Fall, with a vertical leap of 630 ft.; Vernal Fall, 350 ft.; and Nevada Fall, about 600 ft. Mirror Lake, noted for its beautiful reflections, lies near the foot of the cañon of Tenaya Creek, a tributary gorge of the Yosemite.

A distinctive feature of the Yosemite Mountains is their domed form, by some thought to be the result of glacial scour, and by others to be irregular rock expansion. A similar feature is distinctive of the glaciated mountains enclosing some of the Norwegian fjords. The Yosemite Valley is part of the California Yosemite State Park, which is enclosed by the larger Yosemite National Park.

Ypres, ee'p'r (Flem. Yperen or Ypern, ī'pẹrn), a town of Belgium, province of West Flanders, capital of an arrondissement, 30 miles SSW. of Bruges, on the Yperlée. It is an ancient place, and in the thirteenth century was one of the most important cities of western Europe. The vast cloth-hall (Halle des Drapiers), which dates from the time of the city's greatest prosperity, is one of the most striking edifices in Belgium. Its façade is embellished with numerous modern statues. Adjoining the cloth-hall is the handsome Renaissance town-hall. The mediæval cathedral of St. Martin has a superb rose-window and a richly decorated interior. The old Gothic meat-market contains a museum of antiquities and paintings and there is a museum of antique furniture in the Hôtel Merghelynck, an eighteenth-century structure. The Belle-Gasthuis, a municipal asylum for old women, is among the various venerable relics of the past that render Ypres one of the most attractive of Belgian towns. The manufactures comprise chiefly laces and linen; the formerly flourishing woollen-industry has become extinct. Pop. in 1900, 16,552.

Yuba, a post-village of Richland co., Wis., 15 miles SW. of Wonewoc.

Yuba City, a banking post-village, capital of Sutter co., Cal., on the W. bank of the Feather River, opposite the mouth of the Yuba River and on the Southern Pacific R., about 50 miles N. of Sacramento. It has fruit-canning and packing industries.

Yuba River, Cal., is formed by three branches, the North, Middle, and South Yuba, which rise near the Sierra Nevada and unite about 9 miles NW. of Nevada. It runs SW. through Yuba co., and enters the Feather River at Marysville. Gold is found near this river.

Yucatan, yoo-kȧ-tȧn′, a peninsular land-mass, not very strictly defined in its geographical boundaries, but comprising, as ordinarily understood, the Mexican states of Yucatan and Campeche and the military territory (Mexican) of Quintana Roo. In a stricter geographical sense it also includes British Honduras (Balize) and the northern part of Guatemala. It is the southern buttress that chiefly separates the basins of the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea. The Yucatan Channel, which unites these two bodies of water, separates, by a width of some 130 miles, the NE. extremity of Yucatan, at or near Cape Catoche, from the SW. point of Cuba. Much the greater part of Yucatan (in the narrower conception) is a flat or nearly flat plain,—a limestone "plateau" of very low general elevation (100–150 feet)—whose greatest relief (by some asserted not to exceed 500 ft., by others thought to reach nearly 900 ft.) is found in a low ridge or series of ridges, extending in a NW.–SE. direction from a position about 30 miles SW. of the city of Mérida to beyond Peto, or perhaps (with some breaks) completely across the territory of Quintana Roo. This same plain is extended gulfward as a limestone bank (partially of coral formation) to a distance of 125–150 miles or more on the N. and W., where it falls with comparative abruptness into the greater depths of the Gulf basin. Yucatan proper is almost wholly destitute of running water, the water of precipitation being almost immediately absorbed by the porous limestone rocks, or drawn into the numerous sinks (cenotes, aguadas), channels, and subterranean basins with which the region abounds, and which hold the water-level in places 200–300 ft. or more beneath the actual surface. These cenotes are the chief source of water-supply to the inhabitants, and they are frequently reached by long cuttings of steps and inclined planes. The surface of the country is in great part covered with low scrub and trees (jungle), largely of acaceous forms, and in some places has dense matted cactus (cereus, etc.). Magnificent forests (mahogany, rosewood, and other dye-woods) still remain here and there (Campeche) as reminders of the forest which seemingly covered nearly the whole land at the time of the Spanish conquest, and on the N. coast there are extensive sapotewoods (sapotales) and mangrove thickets. The native fauna is tropicopolitan, and includes among its forms the jaguar, armadillo, monkeys (in the northern woods), and vast numbers of the iguana lizard. The principal agricultural product of the region is hennequen (or Sisal hemp), obtained from a species of aloe (Agave sisalensis). Yucatan is rich in ancient remains,—so-called temples, domiciles, pyramids, etc.,—the work of the civilized Mayas, whose construction perhaps does not date farther back than 800–1000 years. Some of the more imposing of such ruins are found at Uxmal, Labna, Loltun, and Chichen-itza. The chief city is Mérida (with Progreso as its port), which is also the capital of the state of Yucatan. The inhabitants consist largely of Indians of Mayan stock.

Yucatan, a state of Mexico, in the peninsula of Yucatan, bordering on the N. on the Gulf of Mexico, and having on the SW. the state of Campeche and on the SE. the territory of Quintana Roo. Area in 1900 (before the separation from it of the territory of Quintana Roo), 35,200 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 314,087. The surface of the state is generally flat, rising in its southern part, in a ridge running from a point SW. of Mérida to (or beyond) Peto, to a height of several hundred feet. There are no running water-courses, but water is obtained from sinks and underground passages (cenotes, aguadas) in the cavernous limestone rock. (See YUCATAN, peninsula). The state contains numerous prehistoric remains, of which the most noted are those of Uxmal. Hennequen (or Sisal hemp) is the chief product. Capital, Mérida (with Progreso as its port).

Yu'catan′, a post-township of Houston co., Minn., on an affluent of the Hokah River, about 26 miles S. of Winona. Pop. in 1900, 830.

Yukon, a banking post-village of Canadian co., Okla., in a grain and fruit region, 13 miles E. of Elreno, on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific R. It has grain-elevators. Pop. about 950.

Yukon, yoo′kon, a judicial district of Canada, occupying its NW. part, and having British Columbia (lat. 60° N.) on the S., the district of Mackenzie on the E., Alaska (meridian of 141° W. lon.) on the W., and the Arctic Ocean on the N. Area, 196,976 sq. m. Pop. in 1901, 27,219. The region lies almost wholly in the basin of the Yukon River, which traverses it nearly medially, and W. and SW. of what are assumed to be the true Rocky Mountains, or the main water-parting between the Yukon and Mackenzie basins. It is more or less mountainous throughout, with general elevations rising to 3000–4000 feet or more. Near the upper waters of the Yukon, W. of Lake Marsh, mounts Lorne and Lansdowne attain elevations of 6400 and 6140 ft. respectively, and in the extreme SW., near the Alaska boundary-line, are several giants of the North American continent: Mount Logan (lat. 60° 35′N., lon. 140° 21′ W.), about 18,000 (19,500?) ft.; Mount Hubbard (lat. 60° 21′ N., lon. 139° 2′ W.), 16,400 ft.; Mount Augusta (lat. 60° 18′ N., lon. 140° 28′ W.), 14,900 ft.; Mount Vancouver (lat. 60° 21′ N., lon. 139° 42′ W.), 15,617 ft.; Mount Cook, 13,700 ft.; and Mount Newton, 13,860 ft. The region bears evidence of having undergone comparatively recent upheaval or tilting. There are no active glaciers, except on the lofty mountains of the SW., and possibly in the far northern snow-covered mountains, but the evidences of past glaciation on a most extensive scale are largely present, especially in the southern sections. Among the tributaries of the Yukon are the Hootalinqua or Teslin, Pelly, Stewart, White, and Porcupine, some of which are navigable for minor craft. Steamboats navigate virtually the entire course of the Yukon. (See YUKON RIVER.) The region is wooded almost to its extreme northern point, and despite the extremely rigorous winters, it gives promise, under the influence of a genial or even hot summer, of considerable agriculture, many vegetables and cereals being successfully grown as far N. as lat. 64°. The chief resource of the region thus far is its gold, which is mined most extensively in the famous Klondike region. (See KLONDIKE.) The judicial seat of the district is DAWSON (which see). An important military post is Fort Selkirk, situated at the confluence of the Yukon and Pelly rivers.

Yukon Hills, Alaska, a range or series of heights between the valleys of the Yukon and Koyukuk rivers.

Yukon River (known also in its upper course as the LEWES RIVER), one of the largest rivers of the western hemisphere, rises in a number of small streams and tarns (Long, Deep, and Crater lakes, tributary to Lake Lindeman) on the N. side of the Chilkoot Pass Mountain, in British Columbia, and has for its main forming-basin or reservoir Lake Bennett (crossed by the parallel of 60° N. lat.), whose surface is 2161 feet above sea-level. From Lake Bennett the river, traversing a number of broad expansions or lakes (Tagish Lake, properly a continuation of Lake Bennett, Lake Marsh, Lake Lebarge), and falling rapidly, pursues a tortuous and generally NW. course to about lat. 64° 52′ N., where (near Eagle) it crosses the Alaska boundary-line, in lon. 141° W. The same general course is continued to Fort Yukon, in the region of the great "Yukon Flats," situated on the Arctic Circle, where the river flows southwestward through 17 degrees of longitude to about lat. 61° 51′ N. and lon. 162° W. Here, in what may almost certainly be assumed to be the head of a former delta (embracing the Kuskokwim as one of its arms), it turns WNW. and then N., and empties, through a number of delta channels, into Norton Sound (of Bering Sea), about 60 miles SW. of St. Michael. The river has a total length probably slightly exceeding 2200 miles, and thus falls from Lake Bennett (or throughout its full navigable course) at the average rate of almost exactly 1 foot per mile. From Dawson, which is situated on the right bank of the river in lat. 64° 2′ N. and lon. 139° 25′ W. (elevation, 1200 ft.), and whose distance from the mouth of the river, as now determined, is approximately 1500 miles, the fall to the sea is but little over ⅔ foot per mile; in the course above Dawson, 1¼ ft. In its upper course, where the velocity of the current is not infrequently 6–7 miles an hour, the river is impeded by several rapids,—the White Horse (lat. 60° 44′ N.), Five Finger, Rink rapids,—none of which are absolute barriers to steam-navigation except the White Horse (together with the swirl of Miles Cañon). Small steamboats have (at rare intervals) descended the entire series of rapids, but in the up-journey an insuperable barrier is presented by the White Horse. A railway now establishes connection between the two navigable sections of the river at this point. The Yukon is in most of its upper course, except in its large lake-like expansions, a narrow and shallow stream, with a depth of water frequently not exceeding 6–10 ft. or less, and in a measure this characteristic is maintained also in the lower stream, where, however, at times of high-water, the waters (as in the region of the Flats) may spread over miles of country, losing the main channel of the river among an intricate net-work of banks and islands. At Dawson the width of the stream is ordinarily about a third of a mile. Throughout a large part of Alaska the course of the Yukon is through a dissected, low-lying plateau, and is lined by superimposed river-terraces, marking stages of high levels formerly occupied by the stream. The chief tributaries of the river are, in descending order, the Teslin (or Hootalinqua), Big Salmon, Little Salmon, Pelly (discharging opposite Fort Selkirk, and by some geographers considered to be one of the forming forks of the main river), White, Stewart, Klondike, and Forty-Nine emptying in Canadian territory, and the Porcupine, Tanana, and Koyukuk discharging in Alaska. The river, which is navigated by a large fleet of flat-bottomed steamboats of the Mississippi pattern, is closed to navigation by ice usually between about the middle of October and June. During much of this period it forms an available highway for sledging. The chief entrance channels are those known as the Aphoon and the Kwikpak. At numerous points along the banks of the Yukon supply- and trading-stations have been located (Andreafski, Holy Cross Mission, Anvik, Kaltag, Nulato, Tanana, Fort Yukon, Circle, Eagle, etc.,—all these in Alaska).

Zambesia, a name indefinitely applied to a large region under British influence in south-central Africa, lying in the basin of the Zambezi River and comprised entirely within the limits of Rhodesia.

Zambesia, one of the major administrative regions or provinces of Portuguese East Africa, in the valley of the Zambezi River and divided into the two minor sub-provinces or districts of Quilimane and Tete.

Zambezi, zâm-bâ'zee, a river of southern Africa, the fourth in size of the rivers of the continent, rises in the "seven springs" or fountains in the extreme eastern part of Angola and close to the head-waters of the Kassai, the chief southern tributary of the Congo, in lat. 11° 33′ 45″ S. and lon. 24° 51′ E.; elevation, 4950 feet. In a vast double curve, whose general trend is SE., it traverses Rhodesia and Portuguese East Africa, and empties into the Indian Ocean through a number of delta-arms (the chief of which is that known as Chinde) in about lat. 18° 30′ S. The course of the western portion of the river forms for some distance the boundary-line between Rhodesia and German Southwest Africa, and the river there receives the Kuando, its chief southern tributary. The upper course of the Zambezi is largely across a monotonous expanse of grass and forest country, whose fundament is constituted in large part by superimposed sheets of nearly horizontal lava or trap. A short distance after entering Rhodesia, and after forming minor rapids and cataracts, the river is precipitated in the magnificent Victoria Falls (225 miles NW. of Buluwayo) into a profound transverse chasm, measuring 1860 yards in length and 250–343 ft. in depth (with a width hardly exceeding 100 ft.), and is then carried away in a tortuous and in places turbulent course, through gorges and over flat country to Portuguese East Africa. The Kebrabasa Rapids, in this territory, NW. of Tete, are the lowest obstructing rapids in the river, which is hence continuously navigable to its mouth, over a distance of 400 miles. Above these rapids the river is again navigable without obstruction to Zumbo, in the extreme W. of Portuguese East Africa, and virtually on the Rhodesian frontier. Several lines of steamboats ply regularly on the course between Tete and the sea. The chief tributary of the Zambezi is the Shiré, the outlet of Lake Nyassa, which joins the major stream a short distance above the head of its delta. The Zambezi is crossed by the Cape-to-Cairo railway immediately below the Victoria Falls, where it flows through a gorge only about 650 ft. wide. The bridge, completed in 1905, has its roadway elevated 420 ft. above the water. Length, estimated at about 1600 miles.

Zamboanga, sâm-bo-ân'gâ, a province in the extreme W. of Mindanao, Philippine Islands, having W. the Sulu Sea, and on the S. the Strait of Basilan and the Gulf of Sibuguey. Area, 3056 sq. m. Pop. in 1903, 44,322. Moros (Mohammedan Malays) inhabit the mountain-chain that traverses its length. It produces the vegetables of the archipelago. Capital, Zamboanga.

Zanzibar, zăn'ze-bar', or Zanguebar, zăng'ghe-bar', an island of eastern Africa, in the Indian Ocean, forming part of the sultanate and of the British Protectorate of Zanzibar, in about lat. 6° 20′ S., 20–30 miles E. of the coast of German East Africa. Area, 640 sq. m. It is mostly low (rising in its highest point to about 1000 feet), partly of coral formation and with a very fertile soil. Nearly the whole of the island is cultivated. Cloves and cocoanuts are extensively grown and constitute an important resource of the island. The population, which is of a very heterogeneous character as the result of the intermingling and intermarriage of the representatives of various eastern African tribes with Arabs, Persians, and traders of other races, is thought to number about 150,000. The island acquires special importance through its capital, the city of Zanzibar, situated on the W. coast, which is the commercial centre or emporium of the trade with eastern equatorial Africa. The European residents probably do not much exceed 200. The climate of the island is fairly healthy, although it has a markedly tropical temperature (mean for the year, 80°).

Zanzibar, a sultanate of eastern Africa, comprising the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba, and with nominal authority extending over the coast-land (to a width of 10 miles from the sea) of the East Africa Protectorate. The sultanate, as restricted to the two islands, is a British Protectorate, having an area of 1020 sq. m. and a population of about 200,000 (150,000 on the island of Zanzibar). It is administered by a resident British agent.

Zanzibar, capital of the sultanate of Zanzibar, and residence of the British agent of the Zanzibar Protectorate, is situated on the W. coast of the island of its own name, on the S. side of a small bay. It is irregularly built, with small winding lane-like streets and almost wholly without architectural features. It has palaces of the sultan, a fort, barracks, hospitals, and a number of mission posts or stations. Zanzibar is an important port of call and coaling-station and the emporium of the trade with east-central Africa. It exports large quantities of native produce and ivory, and is the leading clove-market of the world. It has manufactures of copper- and other metallic wares. Zanzibar ceased to be a free port (which it was constituted in 1892) in 1899. Pop. in 1896, about 60,000, of whom some 200 were Europeans (virtually all the European residents of the island), 7000 East Indians, 4000 Arabs, and 5000 natives from the Comoro Islands.

Zara, zä'rä (It. pron. dzä'rä; anc. Jadera), a seaport of Austria-Hungary, capital of Dalmatia, on a promontory of the Adriatic Sea, opposite the island of Ugliano, 170 miles SE. of Venice. It is Italian in aspect, having been for centuries under Venetian rule, and is of great antiquarian interest. The church of San Donato, dating from the ninth century, and now used as a museum, was partly built out of the remains of a Roman temple. The Porta Marina, an ancient gate, was constructed of similar material. The Romanesque churches of San Grisogono and Santa Anastasia (the latter with a handsome façade and a noteworthy crypt) both date from the thirteenth century. Among other interesting relics of the past are two Corinthian columns (in different parts of the town), one of which served formerly as a pillory; the Loggia, with the Paravia library; a clock tower in the Venetian style; the tower of Buovo d'Antona, which commands a fine view of the town; and the five fountains (Cinque Pozzi), erected in 1574. The site of the old ramparts is now occupied by an attractive quay, the Riva Nuova, and there is a charming public garden with subtropical plants. Beyond the town, reached through the land-gate (Porta di Terraferma), the work of Sanmicheli, is the Imperial Fountain (Pozzo Imperiale), a rotunda, with nine arches, in part of great antiquity. Zara has two theological seminaries and several other educational institutions. The only important industry is the manufacture of a celebrated liqueur (Maraschino). Zara is the seat of a Catholic archbishop and of a Greek bishop. Pop. in 1900, 32,551, mostly Italians.

Zuider (or Zuyder) Zee, zī'dęr zee (Dutch pron. zoi'dęr zå; anc. Flevo Lacus), an arm or gulf of the North Sea, extending southward into the Netherlands, and having the provinces of Overyssel and Friesland on the E., Utrecht and Gelderland on the S., and North Holland on the W. On the N. it is nearly enclosed by the islands Texel, Vlieland, Terschelling, and Ameland, forming part of the Frisian Islands, which at one time constituted a continuous land-mass separating an inland sea or lake (the ancient Zuider Zee) from the open ocean. The continuity of this land-mass, largely in the nature of raised beaches and shifting dunes, was broken through by irruptions of the sea in the latter part of the thirteenth century, since which time the inland basin has remained in open communication with the ocean. The chief connecting passages are (beginning in the W.) the Marsdiep, Eijerlandschgat, Vlie Stroom, Amelander Gat, and the Friescher Gat. The extreme length of the Zuider Zee from N. to S. is 80 miles; greatest width, 34 miles. Near the middle it narrows to a width of about 10 miles, being thus divided into an inner and an outer basin. The mean depth is about 12 feet, with an extreme of 40 feet. The Zee contains several islands,—Wieringen in the NW., Marken in the SW., Schokland in the E., and some minor ones. Its chief tributary is the Yssel, an arm of the Rhine, in the SE. The North Sea Canal, leaving the Zee at Amsterdam, affords communication with the open sea near Ymuiden. It has been proposed to drain the inner basin of the Zuider Zee.

Zújar, thoo'HAR, a town of Spain, province and 58 miles NE. of Granada. Pop. (commune) in 1900, 4573.

Zürich, zoo'rik (Ger. pron. tsü'riK), a canton in the N. part of Switzerland, adjoining the grand-duchy of Baden, from which it is partly separated by the Rhine, and bounded by the cantons of Schaffhausen, Thurgau, St. Gall, Schwyz, Zug, and Aargau. Area, 666 sq. m. Pop. in 1901, 431,637, nearly all German-speaking Protestants. The northern section of the canton, though somewhat mountainous, is part of the open and gently-undulating plateau region of Switzerland, and is extensively cultivated, although the soil is only moderately fertile. The central and southerly parts belong to the mountain area and contain a number of summits rising to about 3500–4000 feet (Schnebelhorn, in the SE., 4250 ft.; Ütliberg, near the city of Zürich, 2865 ft.). The entire canton belongs to the basin of the Rhine, and is watered (apart from the Rhine) by the Thur, Töss, Glatt, Limmat, Sihl, and Reuss. The greater portion of the Lake of Zürich belongs to the canton, which also contains the Greiffensee, the Lake of Pfäffikon and several minor lakes. The climate is mild, but subject to sudden changes. Zürich is preëminently a manufacturing canton, the products of its industries comprising cotton, silk, leather, paper, straw goods, embroideries, and machinery. The government of the canton is of a very democratic type, the executive council, as well as the legislative assembly, being chosen directly by the people. Capital, Zürich.

Zürich (L. Turicum, Tigurum), a city of Switzerland, capital of the canton of its own name, situated on the Limmat, at its exit from the NW. extremity of Lake Zürich, 60 miles NE. of Bern. Lat. of observatory, 47° 22′ 38″ N.; lon. 8° 33′ 4″ E. The Limmat divides the city into the Grosse Stadt on the right and the Kleine Stadt on the left bank. The old quarter has steep and narrow streets and quaint high houses; the modern portions of the city have wide streets and handsome edifices. Broad quays, with attractive promenades, skirt the lake. Near the Alpenquai is the Tonhalle, an elegant building, with concert rooms. South of it extends in an E. direction the Bahnhofstrasse, the principal thoroughfare, which leads to the imposing railroad station. The handsome new Quaibrücke crosses the Limmat at its exit from the lake. Near it are the post-office, the new town-hall (in the mediæval style) and the Stadttheater, all fine modern structures. Below the Quaibrücke, to the E., is the four-arched Münsterbrücke, which leads on the left bank to the church called the Frau-Münsterkirche, begun in the twelfth century; on the right is the former Wasserkirche, which now contains the municipal library (170,000 volumes), with relics of Zwingli. East of the bridge is the Romanesque church called the Grossmünster, begun in the eleventh century, with a statue of Charles the Great. On the quay to the S. of the choir is a statue of Zwingli, who was pastor of the church at the time of his death. East of the church are the massive old town-hall and the Pestalozzianum, containing the Pestalozzi cabinet and the Swiss educational exhibition. South of the Limmat are the Hohe Promenade, a fine shaded avenue, on an elevation affording beautiful views, and the stately Polytechnic, the seat of the university (about 800 students) and of the polytechnic school (over 1100 regular students, besides 600 attending special lectures). The Platz-Promenade skirts the left bank of the Limmat at its confluence with the Sihl, near the eastern end of the town. On the promenade is the large Swiss national museum, a most complete collection of historic- and art-objects, ceramics, ecclesiastical relics, and stained glass. The botanical garden contains a fine exhibit of Alpine plants. The Ütliberg, 2865 feet high, SW. of the city, affords a magnificent view of the valley of the Limmat, Lake Zürich, and the Alps, including the Jungfrau, with the Rigi and Pilatus in the foreground. Zürich is rich in educational institutions. Besides those mentioned, there are a school of forestry, an agricultural school, a picture-gallery of the Zürich artists' union (Künstlergut), and various schools devoted to the arts, industries, and music.

Zürich is the most important industrial and commercial city of Switzerland. It is the centre of the silk-industry, and there are important cotton- and paper-mills, machine-shops, iron-foundries, etc. Pop. in 1880, 24,453; in 1900 (including 9 annexed districts), 150,726.

Zürich rose to the position of a free imperial city of the Holy Roman (German) Empire about the beginning of the thirteenth century. In 1351 the Zürichers joined the Swiss Confederation. The city was the cradle of the Swiss Reformation, the year 1519 witnessing the beginning of the movement initiated by Zwingli. In the battle of Zürich, Sept., 1799, the French, under Masséna, defeated the Russians. By the treaty of Zürich, at the close of the war waged by France and Sardinia against Austria in 1859, Victor Emmanuel II. acquired the bulk of Lombardy.
